One of these men had a theater in New York, costing him $75,000, and was doing a profitable business. He was notified that on and after a certain day his contract would be canceled. He went to the State courts. Now, bear in mind that the purchasing company was willing to pay the current uniform price. They refused to lease. He went into the State courts in 1907 or 1908 and secured an injunction against the film company. The case was finally carried to the court of appeals, which decided that the State court was without authority in the case. He then induced Attorney General Wickersham to bring a suit under the antitrust law, and the Attorney General induced the parties to make an agreement to furnish that one concern with films during the pendency of the lawsuit, and the suit is still pending.

That is the system and that is the way that it destroys competition. That is the way it builds up a monopoly. I ask you to read the story, for I have given only a brief outline of it.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; for a brief question.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. If a person has a patented shoe-manufacturing machine, does not he have the right now to attach such conditions to the use of the machine, and has not the Supreme Court so held? Has it not held that they can make conditions as to the purchase of material necessary to use the machine? Does this law prevent them from making or leasing a patented machine with those conditions?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is on a different proposition, if I understand it.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Does this bill cover it?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No; we did not undertake to deal with the question of resale prices. This bill would prevent a tying or exclusive contract of every kind. This is intended to prevent contracts on condition that the purchaser or lessee will not deal in goods or wares of a competitor in the same line of business. I think this would prohibit a contract—if a machine was sold or leased—that attachments would have to come from that concern.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Whether patented or not?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Whether patented or not. The patent law gives a man the right to the exclusive sale of a commodity in the first instance, and it is in the power of Congress to regulate the sale of patented articles when they pass out of the hands of the original owner into commerce, the same as of unpatented articles. There is no distinction, although the representatives of monopoly claim there is a difference, and appeared before our committee and endeavored to induce us to pass a law that would annul the decision of the Supreme Court in the O'Donnell case and other like cases, wherein the court has held that a patentee has no right or control of the property after he had sold it, and that contracts to that effect are in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. After he has sold it, but in case he leased it he still has the right to fix the condition by which it shall be used.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not if this becomes a law.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I thank the gentleman. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It is to prevent that very thing. The circuit court of appeals in this case holds that that is not in contravention of the Sherman law now, and that is very high authority, and we propose to write it in the statute and make it an unlawful contract. The Supreme Court, in the Northern Securities case, and in the case of Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. against United States, and in other cases, has held that wherever Congress in its wisdom sees fit to prohibit contracts that are deemed in restraint of trade in interstate commerce, it is within the power of Congress to do so.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman referred to the unpatented film a moment ago, and called attention to the fact that the owner of an opera house in New York City was denied the use of this film, and that thereby his business was about to be taken away, and that the Attorney General under the present Sherman law succeeded in causing the film company to furnish films to this man until a certain suit was determined.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. During the pendency of the suit.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not a fact that if this law had been on the statute books the Attorney General's hands would have been tied by this provision in section 2:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act.

And section 3 refers only to mines. Would not this law entirely validate the act of the company in refusing the gentleman in New York?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No; that law has no application to the case. If this law had been on the statute books, it would not have been in the power of the film company to destroy the business of 150 flourishing concerns.

Mr. BRYAN. Could not the film company, under the proviso I have just read, say to any man in New York City, "You can not buy my films"?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Absolutely they can say that now, and we do not propose to prevent any manufacturing firm from saying that, except as to mines, and I will explain that later. But we do propose to say by this provision that men, by making unconscionable contracts, by making contracts affecting competitors, which they have no right in morals to make, and ought not to have in law, shall not longer build up a monopoly in this country by such nefarious practices and methods and destroy other worthy business men who are striving to build up their respective industries. As the President said in his admirable message on trusts and monopolies, we are not the enemies of business in proposing this legislation, but we are the friends of every honest man engaged in business. We do not propose by this legislation to destroy or injure business, but we are endeavoring as conscientious men, engaged in a great cause, to untie the hands of business men in this country that have been shackled for years by the greed of monopoly. [Applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I realize that, but the gentleman does not claim by his argument that this bill would help his man in New York?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will be frank and say that I do not clearly understand the gentleman's point.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman in his argument does not mean to claim that this act would help this man in New York, referred to by him, who was in the unfortunate position of owning an opera house, and needing films, because this provision I have read says that the seller of the films shall have the right to select his own customer. Under the present law the gentleman has stated that the Attorney General was able to give relief, but I say, or at least it seems the way I read it, this law would tie the hands of the Attorney General, and he could not give relief, because the film company would say, "Your law says that I have the right to select my customer, and, Mr. New Yorker I do not select you." Under that what could the man in New York or the Attorney General do?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. But if the film company had not by unfair and unjust and dishonest means and by this practice destroyed the business of 150 other film companies, that man would have had 150 exchanges to have purchased his films from, and could have been independent of the General Film Co. which refused to furnish films to him.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The passage of this bill then presupposes the destruction of the film company, or the dissolution of it?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It presupposes the dissolution of monopoly, and to give the independents an opportunity to do business in this country upon fair and equal terms. That is the purpose of this provision.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I understand that in the moving-picture business now 95 per cent of the films are distributed by three companies. They have exhibitors throughout the country, and they buy from whatever manufacturer they desire. The business, however, has largely gotten into the hands of the distributors. Will the gentleman's bill touch that situation at all?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Absolutely; it is intended to prevent that, and to prevent those exclusive monopolies that are built up by this system. If you destroy the power of monopoly any man can do business independently.

Mr. FESS. If they make their own exhibitions, I mean. The men who distribute the films and have control of them may have their own exhibition houses in every city. The gentleman is not touching that, is he?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The Sherman law will destroy them if those facts are established, and there is a suit pending. They will be dissolved by the Sherman law. This is to prevent that company or any other company by any such wrongful means putting out of business men who are engaged in legitimate enterprise, depriving them of their property by these unconscionable and damnable contracts that the people of the United States and the Congress of the United States ought to condemn everlastingly in this free country of ours. And it ought not to be a question of party. It ought not to make any difference whether a man is a Democrat, a Republican, or a Progressive when it comes to dealing with those powers of wealth and greed and monopoly that have wrecked hundreds of empires in the past. Men ought to rise to the high ground of patriotism and with courage do their duty. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. The gentleman did not take it from my question that I asked him what I did in a partisan way. I simply wanted the facts.

Mr. NELSON. Then, why did not the gentleman permit some Republican to be upon the subcommittee? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas I did not have the make-up of the subcommittee or the full committee. I am an humble member of the committee and perform as best I can whatever duties that are assigned to me.

Mr. NELSON. But the gentleman is a fair and honest member of the committee and can——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. This suggestion—a little party quibble injected into the consideration of a great question—ought to be beneath the dignity of my able and distinguished friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, if I may interrupt the gentleman just at this point——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not for that purpose. I say to the gentleman I am not responsible for the make-up of the committee and I can not explain that question. I state frankly the gentleman is not a member of the subcommittee. I state frankly that the chairman, Mr. CARLIN, and myself were the only members of the subcommittee. Why, I can not answer, because I do not know and never sought the position assigned to me as a member of the subcommittee. I have tried to do my duty in this as in every other position assigned to me by those in charge of great matters, both on the committee and in the House, and I am here upon this measure as much a representative of what I conceive to be for the best interests of the Progressives and Republicans as I am for what I conceive to be to the best interests of the Democracy; and I want every man in this House to understand my personal attitude. [Applause.] So much for No. 4. Now, just briefly I want to revert to section 3 simply to say that section 3 was inserted because we believed that in handling products of mines the owner or operator ought not be permitted to exercise that control or to secure a monopoly which might result in serious detriment to the general public. It is a concession in the interest of the public, so that we believe that the mine operator who handles coal should not be permitted to withhold his coal at his pleasure from customers.

The God of nature stored these great resources in the earth and we believe those who make the laws ought to deal with them in a different way from things like patented commodities or manufactured articles that are the work and product of men's hands. And this is in the interest of the manufacturers, too, because the evidence shows that many giant monopolies have been built up by owning both the manufacturing concerns and the mines and favoring the concern in which they were interested to the detriment and the ruin of the independent manufacturers who are struggling along for existence in the same kind of industry.

Mr. AVIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will yield for just one question.

Mr. AVIS. I want to say to the gentleman that I am not impugning the gentleman's motives in any way in regard to this matter——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The only thing that is worrying me is that my time is limited, and I think I can make a more consecutive argument by dealing with the several questions as I desire to deal with them if I may be permitted to go along without interruption.

Mr. AVIS. I only wanted to ask the gentleman with reference to section 3, and, as I said, I do not impugn to the gentleman any bad motives. I know the gentleman's motives are of the very best, and that the other members of the committee are actuated by the same motives, and the criticism embraced in the question I desire to propound, if at all, is a criticism of their judgment and not of their motives. Now, I come from a coal-producing section and knowing something of the coal business and knowing that there are 6,000 independent bituminous coal operators in that country, I want to ask the gentleman if the committee or any member thereof can point to one single abuse committed by any one of the bituminous coal operators of this country, or can the committee say to this House that they heard from any one of the 6,000 operators engaged in this industry before drawing this section?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I can not go into details to answer that question further than to say that the provision was inserted in this bill and generally met with the approval of men from all parts of the country who commented upon it.

Mr. AVIS. Does the gentleman know, or was the evidence before the committee, that instead of there being an underproduction of bituminous coal in this country there is an overproduction, and that the bituminous coal of this country is being sold and delivered, including freight, in New England at prices less than at the pit mouth at Cardiff, Wales?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will state very frankly I do not recall whether any operators engaged in the mining of bituminous coal in West Virginia appeared before our committee or not, and I can not answer that question; but let me suggest to the gentleman, if he has facts that will tend to show this provision is wrong, let him secure time and present them. The bill is open to amendment. We have done the best we could with it, and we have brought it back to the House, and we submit it to you. We open wide the opportunity for amendment, and if it is wrong, and it can be demonstrated that it is wrong, we will not resist an amendment.

Mr. AVIS. If the gentleman will permit another short question, I will not trouble the gentleman any more——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I thought I answered the gentleman's question as to that particular locality.

Mr. AVIS. I thought perhaps the committee had in mind some abuse, and I want to ask the gentleman if his committee knew of a single abuse on the part of the bituminous operators of this country which they had in mind in the preparation of this section?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The gentleman asks about bituminous coal?

Mr. AVIS. Yes; more particularly.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will tell the gentleman what I said at the outset. I can not answer details of that sort; but we did have abundant evidence before our committee that those who control the production and mining of coal do so to the detriment of the public.

Now I desire to pass to section 5. Section 5 is simply a reenactment of the provisions of section 7 of the Sherman law, so as to make it applicable to the provisions of this bill. Section 6 provides—and I desire to discuss this section briefly—that where the United States institutes a suit and proceeds to final decree against an unlawful combination under the terms of section 4 of the Sherman Act that the final judgment or decree may be used as evidence in a suit by a private litigant against such corporation.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question, for information?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; one question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does this section 3, referring to mines, cover oil and gas?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We so understand it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Are there decisions——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; and if the gentleman desires to insert such an amendment he will have opportunity to do so. We understand that it does.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I assumed that the gentleman's committee had gone into that with very great care.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Now, I have made inquiries and I have heard very little objection to this provision, and will be glad if you would hear our position on that. Many combinations have been dissolved under the Sherman law by the decree of the United States courts. The proceedings were lengthened out for years, and at the end of the suits they were adjudged by the courts to be unlawful combinations, and yet parties who had been injured by the unlawful acts of those corporations were without redress. This proposes to suspend the statute of limitations during the continuation of such suits, and at the end of the suit, if the Government obtains a decree, or a decree is obtained, provides that that may be used in evidence in behalf of the private suitor in a suit for damages, under section 7 of the Sherman law and under the corresponding section of this bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Briefly, for a question.

Mr. SCOTT. I will be very brief. I notice that this section provides that in case of an adjudication in an antitrust suit to be brought by the United States, involving the Sherman law, that the judgment in the United States case shall be conclusive evidence either for or against the defendant in any subsequent suit brought under the antitrust law by individuals:

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Against that particular corporation covering the period of that suit.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes. Now, what I want the gentleman to explain is this: Assuming that under section 5 here a corporation has been guilty of a violation of the antitrust law, entered into a great conspiracy, and has damaged me, we will say, in the sum of $10,000 or $20,000, and I bring suit against this corporation. After issue is joined I find I am confronted with this plea, that 60 days before, in a suit to which I had not been a party, a district judge sitting in equity had decided and rendered a decree to the effect that this corporation had not been guilty of a conspiracy.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I hope the gentleman will not take my time, but will ask the question.

Mr. SCOTT. This section says that that judgment or decree shall be conclusive evidence against me. Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Conclusive evidence in your favor if the judgment is against the corporation, but if the corporation has won its suit, conclusive evidence against you; yes, sir.

Mr. SCOTT. Then what becomes of my constitutional right, both of a trial by jury and of due process of law?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not think that interferes with your constitutional right. It simply relates to the decree and its admissibility as evidence. You can bring your suit. You can try it on the evidence adduced and before a jury. It affects nothing but the evidence in that suit and the law in that suit.

Mr. SCOTT. No. The fact is conclusive against me by that decree.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The fact in that suit.

Mr. SCOTT. Which was the conspiracy that was the cause of action.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It might be the state of facts proven had no relation to your cause of action.

Mr. SCOTT. But I am assuming this particular conspiracy is the one I am declaring upon.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Suppose the gentleman will pass that for the present. Take it up under the five-minute rule. I will be glad to debate it with him then. But I am trying to give you an outline of this bill for your information, and we have brought in a rule giving the greatest opportunity for debate under the five-minute rule. I hope the gentleman will permit me to proceed. That section simply provides—and it is based upon the broad ground of public policy—and these suits are brought in behalf of the whole people of the United States—that when a decree is obtained against an unlawful combination that the decree may be used in private suits brought against the defendant corporation. And I desire to state for the benefit of the Members of the House that very little objection has been urged to that provision before our committee. Some of the best constitutional lawyers that have been before that committee have never questioned for one moment its constitutionality.

Now, I must hurry along, and I desire to take up briefly section 7, which is the next section, in connection with sections from 15 to 23. These are the labor sections of this bill, and I want to detail to you briefly what is accomplished by them. Now, I will be glad to have your attention, gentlemen, because I desire to discuss quite fully these labor sections of the bill.

There is a general impression among some, it seems, that section 7 is the labor section of the bill. That is only one of the labor sections of the bill. The sections from 15 to 23 relate exclusively to labor questions, and I desire to explain them, and then take up section 7 in conclusion and show you just what the labor provisions of this bill do, and explain the meaning and effect of section 7 and also its importance and scope.

During the Sixty-second Congress two bills relating to labor—what is known as the Clayton anti-injunction bill and what is known as the Clayton contempt bill—were passed in the House. Both passed the House, and I will give you the vote on each of the bills. Minority reports were filed against them by distinguished members of the committee, who were able lawyers, but when the injunction bill was voted on in the House only 31 votes were cast against it in the whole House, including Republicans, Progressives, and Democrats. When the bill giving right to trial by jury in contempt cases was voted on in the same Congress only 18 votes were cast against it in the whole House. We have placed those two bills, which passed the House, as stated, and which afterwards were indorsed at the Baltimore convention by the Democratic Party, bodily in this bill, with only slight amendment to section 15, to make it conform to equity rule 73 of the Supreme Court of the United States, since adopted by that court. What do we give labor in these several provisions? I will tell you what labor gets in the sections from 15 to 23.

United States courts are prohibited from issuing injunctions against persons on account of their ceasing to perform any work or labor—one of the things for which Federal courts in the past have issued injunctions in labor disputes.

Second. From issuing injunctions to prevent laborers from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do.

Third. To enjoin laboring men from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from work.

That is a thing for which laboring men from time to time have been enjoined by different Federal courts.

Fourth. Or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute.

This is another thing for which laboring men have been repeatedly enjoined, and which we regard as an abuse of the injunction writ.

Fifth. Or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do.

Another thing for which laboring men have been enjoined.

Sixth. Or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value.

A monstrous thing to think of, but, according to the testimony of William B. Wilson, now Secretary of Labor, who testified before our committee at the last Congress that he, as secretary of one of these organizations, was enjoined during a strike from paying those sick benefits by the Federal courts. This prohibits for the future such outrageous injunctions being issued against any laboring man or labor associations.

Seventh. Or from peacefully assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes.

That is a thing that ought never to have been denied to any citizen in America—a guaranteed constitutional right—but a thing which the Federal courts, by the use of the injunctive process, have repeatedly enjoined laboring men from doing.

Eighth. Or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

In other words, this puts laboring men upon the same equality under the law with every other citizen, and requires the same cause of action; requires an injunction in a case growing out of a labor dispute to be issued upon the same evidence as in any other case where a labor dispute is not involved. The injunction provisions of this bill give to labor a bill of rights on eight different propositions, in which, by the abusive practices of injunctions in the past, they have been harassed in numerous cases and often imprisoned.

Not only that, but it requires notice and forbids blanket injunctions. The provisions in the second bill give to laboring men the right of trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt, where the acts complained of would constitute criminal offenses under the law. And right here I want to call your attention to one significant thing. In the decision rendered by the Supreme Court in the Gompers case a few days ago you will find a strong intimation given by the justice delivering the opinion that the trial of these cases by jury is more satisfactory than by courts.

Now, those are the labor provisions. We bring them to you. They have been indorsed by this House. They have been specifically indorsed by our party. They have been adhered to and observed by many of the courts. But there is one additional provision which I will take up now, because it is new. It was not in the Clayton bill at the last Congress, and, so far as I know, it has never been in any other bill pending before this Congress. I refer to section 7 of the bill. I will explain to you briefly how that provision got into this bill.

The Democratic platform at Baltimore declared specifically in favor of the injunction bill passed in the Sixty-second Congress; declared for the right of trial by jury in contempt cases; and declared in favor of legislation that would differentiate and distinguish labor and farmers' organizations from other organizations, saying, to use the language of the platform, that they should not be deemed or considered unlawful combinations in restraint of trade under the Sherman law. But it did not declare for any specific exemption from the Sherman law. Bear that in mind.

Now, on December 6, 1913, I believe it was, Mr. Gompers, the head of the American Federation of Labor, appeared before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House and made a plea for additional legislation in behalf of labor organizations. He read the Democratic platform; he read the Progressive platform; he alluded to the Republican platform, saying that its declarations for labor were nil. Then he made a speech, and I desire to quote from it and read it into the RECORD, because I think it is worthy of going into the RECORD. It is whispered now, since some people have become dissatisfied with this provision, that there is nothing in his contention. I think there is. I quote from Mr. Gompers:

Gentlemen, under the interpretation placed upon the Sherman antitrust law by the courts, it is within the province and within the power of any administration at any time to begin proceedings to dissolve any organization of labor in the United States and to take charge of and receive whatever funds any worker or organization may have wanted to contribute or felt that it is his duty to contribute to the organization.

Mr. WEBB. Are there any suits pending in the courts now looking to this end, Mr. Gompers?

Mr. GOMPERS. There are no suits now pending; but an organization of workingmen, the window-glass workers, was dissolved by order of the court under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, charged with conspiracy as an illegal combination in restraint of trade. And while that organization was dissolved by action of the court, yet it created no furor, for this reason: I have no desire to reflect upon the men who are in charge of that organization as its officers and representatives, but it was, in my judgment, supine cowardness for them not to resist an attempt of the dissolution of their associated effort as a voluntary organization of men to protect the only thing they possessed—the power to labor.

Mr. WEBB. Have you any case where a labor organization has been dissolved simply because they themselves united in asking or fixing a certain wage and went no further in uniting with the manufacturers?

Mr. GOMPERS. I can not tell you, sir, about that. But that is the very essence of the life of the organization. What I want to convey is this, that of these 30,000 or more local associations of workingmen, what we call local unions of workingmen and workingwomen, probably more than two-thirds have agreements with employers. As a matter of fact, I think that every observer and every humanitarian who knows greeted with the greatest satisfaction the creation of the protocol in the sweated industries of New York City and vicinity which abolished sweatshops and long hours of labor, and the burdensome, miserable toil prevailing, and established the combination of employers and of workmen and workwomen by which certain standards are to be enforced, and no employer can become a member of the manufacturers' association in that trade unless he is willing to undersign an agreement by which the conditions prevailing in the protocol will be inaugurated by him. Yet, under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law that association of manufacturers has been sued, I think, for something like $250,000, because it is a conspiracy in restraint of trade.

What I mean to say is this: I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that the Attorney General of this administration, the Attorney General of the United States under the present administration, is not going to dissolve or make any attempt to dissolve the organizations of the working people of this country. I firmly believe that if there should be any of them, any individual or an aggregation of individuals, guilty of any crime, that the present administration would proceed against them just as readily, and perhaps more so, as any other; I am speaking of the procedure against the organizations themselves and the dissolution of them. But who can tell whether this administration is going to continue very long, or whether the same policy is going to be pursued; that is, the policy of permitting these associations to exist without interference or attempts to isolate them? Who can tell? What may come; what may not the future hold in store for us working people who are engaged in an effort for the protection of men and women who toil to make life better worth living? We do not want to exist as a matter of sufferance, subject to the whims or to the chances or to the vindictiveness of any administration or of an administration officer. Our existence is justified not only by our history, but our existence is legally the best concept of what constitutes law. It is an outrage; it is an outrage of not only the conscience; it is not only an outrage upon justice, it is an outrage upon our language to attempt to place in the same category a combination of men engaged in the speculation and the control of the products of labor and the products of the soil on the one hand and the associations of men and women who own nothing but themselves and undertake to control nothing but themselves and their power to work.

Mr. FLOYD. I want to see if I understand your position. If I understand your position under the existing status of the law as determined by the Federal courts, if the Attorney General should proceed to dissolve any of your labor organizations they could be dissolved. Is that your proposition?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLOYD. And that your existence, therefore, depends upon the sufferance of the administration which happens to be in power for the time being.

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLOYD. What you desire is for us to give you a legal status under the law?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLOYD. So you can carry on this cooperative work on behalf of the laborers of the country and of the different organizations without being under the ban of the existing law?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question just there?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Just at the beginning of Mr. Gompers's testimony did I understand he stated that there was an organization of employers in New York City who issued a protocol in relation to the employment of labor? I did not quite catch the meaning there.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No. That association was not dissolved, but a reference was made to the association of glass-workers that was dissolved.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The other was not?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No, sir. Mr. Gompers was speaking of the excellent work of the other organization, which was not dissolved.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. He claimed that it could be dissolved?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes; he claimed that it could be dissolved. And anyone who has read carefully the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil case and in the American Tobacco case and other leading cases decided by the Supreme Court, as a lawyer, must realize that Mr. Gompers's contention is correct.

If you find a court with the facts to sustain a conspiracy in restraint of trade and the courage to do it in a proper case, it is within the power of the court to enter a decree of dissolution. You can see what such a decree would do for labor organizations. When the Standard Oil Co. was dissolved there were millions of property which the equity court, under the rules of procedure, exercising its equity jurisdiction, was required to protect and conserve, and this property formed a nucleus around which a new organization was formed to take over the property and continue to operate, and the same with respect to the American Tobacco Co. But for what were those great combinations dissolved? For being combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade. The inanimate thing known as "a combination" can do nothing. It acts through agencies, through living human agencies, that make the unlawful contracts, do the unlawful acts, perform the things that they are doing in violation of law; and if an industrial corporation and its agents have so violated the Sherman law, they can be dissolved. And who can gainsay the proposition that if individual members of labor organizations should do unlawful things and enter into unlawful contracts and enter into conspiracies in restraint of trade, the same power that dissolved the Standard Oil Co. and the same power that dissolved the American Tobacco Trust can dissolve the labor organizations, with this more disastrous effect—there being no nucleus of property around which to gather the fragments of the association, they would go to the four winds and be out of existence. And yet I am sorry to say that I have been told that there are those who contend that the committee has done nothing for labor by incorporating this provision in the bill. We are giving labor associations a legal existence and declaring their operations legal by this provision. We are taking them out from the ban of the present law to the extent that in future they can not be dissolved as unlawful combinations. Their existence is made lawful and they are given a legal status.

In other words, recognizing and believing as a committee that the plea made by Samuel Gompers, the head of the great American Federation of Labor, was a just plea, well founded, in the light of past decisions, and that those great organizations of workingmen ought not to be considered and classed as unlawful combinations per se and ought not to be subjected to the same rule applied to industrial corporations or to be dissolved by court decree, we have incorporated section 7 in this bill, declaring legal labor and other organizations named therein.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 1 hour and 59 minutes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Gentlemen, I am sorry that my limited time has not permitted me to go into a discussion of other important features of this bill, but under the five-minute rule we will have ample opportunity to do so.

I should like to take up the question of interlocking directorates and the provision relating to holding companies. I should like to take up other provisions of the bill; but in the time allotted me I have only touched upon some of the more vital features of this great piece of legislation proposed in the interest of the American people generally, the labor provisions, constituting, as they do, a great bill of rights for labor, sections 2 and 4 furnishing a bill of rights and equity to every independent small dealer in this country. In conclusion, let me say we submit this bill as the result of an earnest effort on the part of the Judiciary Committee to carry out the will of the House in framing a bill which we trust will meet with the approval of the House, and we hope the approval of the country.

I thank you for your patient attention. [Applause.]

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, the ranking Member on the Republican side is absent and has asked me to take charge of the time during his absence. I will yield to myself 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, with other minority Members, I shall support the first part of the present so-called antitrust program, the creation of an interstate trade commission. I do so with pleasure, because in its preparation the minority was granted recognition. It is a definite legislative measure, and, on the whole, this commission, with additional powers, may prove a beneficial agency for the final solution of the trust evil.

It is with a deep sense of disappointment that, for the same reasons reversed, I can not give my support to the bill now before us. It comes from the committee of which I have the honor of being a member. I have the highest personal esteem for the gentlemen of the subcommittee who framed the bill.

These gentlemen, but for a powerful restraining hand, have the ability and, I believe, the patriotic desire to construct a far better law; and I had hoped that we all could prepare and support a measure that would reflect credit upon the committee and redound greatly to the welfare of the country.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. What restraining hand does the gentleman refer to? Is not this House free to do what it sees fit, and may not its Members exercise their own privileges and prerogatives?

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman has evidently not been reading the newspapers.

Mr. SLOAN. I recognize in the gentleman a greater authority, and I appeal to him.

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman must know from the discussion to-day that a subcommittee was appointed, consisting of three very able Democrats. No Republican was given any recognition on that subcommittee; and if we may rely on the newspapers they were constantly in consultation with the President on all the details of the bill, and they are carrying out his instructions.

Much as I wish to act with my colleagues on the committee, I must truthfully state my views of this bill. It was conceived in the spirit of partisanship and molded in every detail by the motive of political expediency. It is not constructive legislation upon broad principles but by arbitrary selection, nor by positive and certain enactments but by vague and undefined exceptions, and does not bravely grapple with the giant evil of monopoly itself, but turns to its manifestations and unrelated side issues. Finally, it is doubtful whether the harm that will result from this bill will not outweigh the small amount of good some of its provisions might accomplish.

It will be a matter of extreme regret, I feel certain, to every American citizen, irrespective of politics, who takes a large and patriotic view of this whole subject that the party intrusted with power has failed so completely to measure up to the great opportunity and the sacred duty of the hour. Instead of devoting itself to the sincere solution of the problem of our day and generation, it has weakly yielded to the spirit of political expediency and truckling compromise, by way of inaction if not reaction. Before the last election the party pointed to the pathway of duty. It bravely asserted that "a private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable," and this was its platform pledge:

> We favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

There was a ring of genuine truth in that proclamation, and there was patriotism in that pledge, and it appealed to the American people. Private monopoly is intolerable, and competition must be restored as the working basis of our national life. Competition offers, in my opinion, the best environment for the advancement and the welfare of mankind in the individual initiative, the individual independence, and the individual responsibility.

We should now have the courage and foresight of statesmanship. We may yet be master of our country's future; but if we trifle, halt, or compromise too long competition, now greatly endangered, may never be restored, and then what—socialism?

No nation is so great that it can safely overlook the law of consequence. None are so blind as they who will not see. There are those who look upon socialism as a menacing evil, but what are the signs of the times? Is there no significance in the rapid progress that socialism is making both in the United States and abroad? Socialists sit in the cabinets of Italy, France, and Norway, and they are the strongest political party in Germany. In the United States Socialist gains have kept pace with the increase in the number and power of the trusts. For President of the United States in 1912, 1,000,000 American citizens voted for a radical Socialist. We can not safely ignore the principle of cause and effect. As surely and rapidly as the properties of all the people pass into the hands of a few trust magnates, public sentiment, rapidly forming, when once fully aroused, will multiply the socialistic vote as a protest against monopoly privilege. And the day when the people must choose between public ownership of trusts for the benefit of all and the private ownership of the trusts for the privilege of the few, will witness the final triumph of socialism in this country. Therefore we should act in our days of grace, while we are yet masters of our national destiny; but will this compromise measure before us now, this mere marking time, remove the cause, the special monopoly privilege of levying tribute manifested in the high cost of living, and thus prevent the much-dreaded social change in the conditions of our national life?

REGULATED MONOPOLY.

Some well-meaning theorists imagine they see a place of escape, a permanent middle ground, in a state of regulated monopoly. But they are merely deceiving themselves. They say that the trusts are more efficient and can produce more cheaply. They urge that the dangers of oppression may be removed by regulation and that the principle of concentration in industry under regulated monopoly will result in benefit to all the people. But these fond hopes and fancies are fallacious.

TRUSTS NOT EFFICIENT.

The trusts have not been efficient. The source of their success has been the unfair tactics employed against the independents and the monopoly privileges they have enjoyed. No trusts show cheaper cost of production than do the smaller independent plants. The explanation lies near at hand. When a concern grows so large that the men at the head can not possibly be familiar with every angle of the business, gross inefficiency results. The element of personal management so essential to business success disappears. In the interest, therefore, merely of cheaper production, it is desirable that the trusts should be destroyed.

PRICE FIXING.

Nor is regulation of monopolized industry practicable. In the pathway toward regulated monopoly there are many immovable rocks. The foremost is price fixing. With the specter of the cost of living before us we can not permit monopolies to charge prices at will. But in fixing prices the Government must do justice to all interests alike. It must take into consideration the values of these great properties, the rights of the owners, the needs of the consumers, the returns to the farmer for his raw materials, the wages of the laborer in the mills, and many other important matters. The problem is, as may be seen at a glance, a stupendous impossibility.

Fixing prices calls for commissions. How many—1 or 800? Able men who have given this point special study say that there would have to be a separate commission, at least, for each line of business. What a mire of bureaucratic government we would run into! Think of the arbitrary power of such commissions!

CORRUPTION.

Then, too, there are other accompanying evils. Big business to protect profits will go into politics; a small increase in prices will mean millions of extra profits; and in consequence we would always have present the grave danger of political and official corruption.

BUSINESS STAGNATION.

Regulated monopoly is likely to mean not only bad government but business stagnation. When commissions allow monopolies regular fixed profits, whether they be 6 per cent or 10 per cent, the keen incentive for making improvements in the processes of manufacture will disappear. Efficient or not, they will earn the same regular dividends.

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP.

The final consideration in regulating monopoly is that it will inevitably lead to socialism. Under regulation, if prices are high, candidates and parties will bid for votes on the plea of reducing the cost of living. Regulation may then lead to confiscation, and socialism is at hand. On the other hand, if prices are not reduced, there will be the increasing demand for public ownership. To compromise with monopoly is to end in socialism.

THE TEST OF LEGISLATION.

Difficult as the problem of restoring competition may seem, it presents no such insurmountable obstacles as lie in the pathway of regulated monopoly. As a Nation, with the Sherman law unrepealed, we are committed to competition. This bill, or any trust bill, must be measured by the standard of its efficiency to restore competition. There can be no satisfactory compromise. Monopoly in every form must be made impossible. Any measure which falls short of this is but a makeshift and not a thoroughgoing solution of this great evil.

THE CHANGE IN PROGRAM.

The President of the United States, a profound student of history, before his election saw plainly the duty of the hour, and I even now believe that he really desired to assail this evil with all the power of his great office, but after the tariff bill had been passed it became evident that the cost of living had not come down and that business was rapidly approaching a standstill. There were signs of panic in the air, and if not in the country there was a real panic among Democrats in Congress. There was a lively fear of a possible overturning of the political equilibrium. Thinking that readjustment of our currency system would restore public confidence, the party in power rushed through Congress its money bill, and still there was business paralysis.

It was evident to a close observer of current events that the party in power would not have the courage to grapple with the trust problem in dead earnest, but what was it to do? It had to steer between Scylla and Charybdis, betrayal of public confidence in deserting its trust program or so disturbing the big business interests that a panic might be precipitated in all its dreadful reality. Then it was that political expediency caused a sudden change in party program.

A PREDICTION.

Six months ago in magazine articles I pointed out just what would take place, and the expected has come to pass. Among other things this was said:

In this situation the easiest road is that of compromise—to pass some halfway measures and then try to make the people believe that the country has been relieved from the thraldom of the trusts. There is much talk of going slow. It is proposed to pass a few bills, such as making the penalties of the Sherman law personal and abolishing interlocking directorates, so as to make a showing of reform, but not seriously disturb Wall Street. It behooves the people to watch closely coming events. This is a time when words count for less than results.

At the same time the hope and sincere wish was expressed that the President would play the part of David and slay the Goliath of private monopoly.

ASSURING BIG BUSINESS.

But the President, yielding to the pressure of political expediency, in his trust address to Congress sounded the keynote of compromise when he told big business in honeyed words that "the antagonism between business and Government is over," that in its place "an atmosphere of accommodation and mutual understanding" has been ushered in. Vice President Marshall said, "What we need is much agitation and little legislation." Senator HOKE SMITH said, "Readjustments can be made peaceably and litigation will not be required." And Chairman CLAYTON assured big business interests that "nothing radical" would be done.

THE SUBCOMMITTEE.

To make certain of this, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary he appointed two Democratic members to act with himself as a subcommittee in the preparation of a trust program. This partisan subcommittee, in frequent consultation with the President, prepared three tentative bills. It was quite evident that Chairman CLAYTON'S promise was made good. These bills did not alarm the trusts; they did disturb small business men.

SUGGESTIONS OFFERED.

Extensive hearings were granted upon these tentative bills. Representatives of small business associations appeared to protest against the arbitrary manner in which their methods of doing business were interfered with. Thoughtful students of the trust problem—men like Louis D. Brandeis, Samuel Untermeyer, Albert H. Walker, and others—showed clearly that these bills would not be effective in restoring competition. Numerous excellent suggestions were offered to make them really effective means for destroying private monopoly.

PARTISANSHIP.

When hearings were concluded this partisan subcommittee presented a consolidated bill. It did not avail itself of the many helpful suggestions that had been made, dropped out the teeth in the definitions bill, and added some new provisions dealing with holding companies, farmer and labor organizations, and the use of injunctions in labor disputes. No Republican had any part whatever in the preparation of the bill. The partisan subcommittee worked behind closed doors. Not a change was made without its consent. The full committee reported the bill to the House by a strictly partisan majority. So evident, in fact, was the partisanship that no member of the minority cared to take any part in the final vote. From beginning to end, it may be said with perfect accuracy, this bill was conceived in a spirit of partisanship and molded in every detail by the motive of political expediency. [Applause on the Republican side.]

COMPROMISE.

The compromise character of this measure is apparent in every provision. It is a tight-rope performance with the fears of Wall Street balanced against the demands of the people. Hence its vagueness, its exceptions, and its side issues. Its various sections resemble certain signs which as you read them from the front say one thing, but when you read them from the side or the rear say something wholly different.

In the minority views I presented as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary a detailed analysis of this bill was made; here I shall point out only generally how it carries water on both shoulders in the effort to please plutocracy and at the same time placate the public.

TEETH IN SHERMAN LAW.

The first part deals with two unfair methods of competition—discrimination in price and the making of exclusive contracts. They are the remnant of the first attempt of the learned doctors on the subcommittee to equip the Sherman law with a full set of teeth, so as to repair the supposed ravages of the Supreme Court's rule of reason in the Oil and Tobacco cases. In the course of the hearings, however, the crude workmanship of the subcommittee was made so apparent that when the consolidated bill reappeared from the secret workroom of these conservative "trust busters" there were only two teeth left. These were not to be inserted in the Sherman Act, but were to constitute, so to speak, independent fangs, with which to threaten and to harass little business.

DISCRIMINATION.

The section dealing with price discrimination presents an interesting exhibit of the skill of these trust-law draftsmen in so writing the provision that it shall appear fair on its face to the public at large and yet shall not materially disturb the well-known practices of big business. To the public it apparently prohibits all discrimination between different individuals and communities, but upon examination we find various loopholes carefully provided for the benefit of the big fellows. Thus discrimination is not prohibited in bids and offers for sale.

Discrimination may be made in the time and manner of delivery of goods, in more lenient terms of credit, or in any other terms of sale except those of price. Even discrimination in price is permitted, unless it can be shown to have been made with the intent of wrongfully injuring or destroying the business of a competitor. The selling of goods cheaper at home than abroad is expressly authorized. Then there is the proviso that discrimination may be made on account of the "grade, quality, or quantity" of the commodity sold. Does anybody believe that a trust can be successfully prosecuted when it is allowed to discriminate on account of the quantity sold? Finally, the trusts are permitted to select their own customers. This means that they may altogether refuse to deal with anybody they wish to crush. No form of discrimination could be worse, but by this bill it is expressly legalized.

EXCLUSIVE CONTRACTS.

The section dealing with exclusive contracts has the same vice of uncertainty. It apparently prohibits exclusive contracts, but if they are made with nominal agents or bailees the trusts may readily evade the law. This bill says sellers shall not make exclusive contracts, but it also says that sellers may select their own customers. Interpreted in the most favorable light possible, the effect of this section will be to prohibit open and aboveboard contracts, but leaves open the means of accomplishing the same result through an undeclared and unexpressed understanding between the parties.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I want to see if I understand the gentleman. Does the gentleman mean by the remark he made a moment ago that if you give the Douglas Shoe Co. the right to sell its goods to only one person in a town you might thereby just as well give them the right to require that person to agree not to buy from anybody else except the Douglas Shoe Co.?

Mr. NELSON. Indeed, when I have the right to say to you that you can not be my customer, I can in my own mind prescribe the conditions under which I will refuse to make you my customer.

Mr. HARDY. In other words, if you agree that you will sell to me alone, it will be equivalent to my agreeing that I will buy from you alone.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; but the manufacturer must not make an outright contract with you. A man does not need to be hit on the head with a crowbar in order to grasp an idea or a suggestion.

Mr. HARDY. I do not think you need to make any further contract than that you will sell only to me, in order to induce me to buy only from you.

Mr. ADAIR. I want to ask the gentleman, does he believe that this law should go far enough to compel the Douglas Shoe Co.—as reference has been made to that company—to sell to everyone who would buy of that company in the same town? Do you not believe the company should have the right to make some particular firm or store its customer and give that customer the exclusive right to sell the Douglas product in that particular town?

Mr. NELSON. Answering the gentleman, I would say that I would be just to all. I would not discriminate. But we have here the gentleman saying to the mine owners, "You must sell to all," and we have them saying to other than mine owners, "You may select your customer." I would make the rule either one way or the other. I would be fair, and not arbitrary.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. How would the gentleman state the rule about that?

Mr. NELSON. If I had to state the rule about that I would be fair to all, and I think we are coming to that, when big business concerns have no right to say they will not sell to any customer who offers to pay cash.

Mr. ADAIR. You would be in favor, then, of a provision in this bill which would make it impossible for the manufacturer of any particular article to refuse to sell that product to anyone who wanted to buy it.

Mr. NELSON. If he offered cash for the commodity, I see no reason why the manufacturer should be permitted to refuse.

Mr. ADAIR. And on the same terms, and so forth.

Mr. NELSON. Now, on that question I want to say this, that having had no opportunity to participate in the preparation of this bill, so far as action of the subcommittee is concerned, and at any time only the merest pretense of opportunity, which amounted to listening to the hearings and seeing gentlemen on the other side offer some amendments to their bill, the Republicans and minority members have had nothing to do with it. Therefore we have not formulated a program, and we are not responsible for the program. If the gentleman wants to know what I would do, I would have taken, as the Committee on Interstate Commerce did, representatives of all parties, and then sought to legislate, along the lines of principle, for equal treatment for all, and not pick out the mine owner as the man who must sell to anybody, and then leave all the rest to have the right to select their own customers.

Mr. HARDY. Along that line, will the gentleman tell me whether there is any real difference in the situation of a mine owner, producing ore from the earth, and any other maker or producer as to any rights that the one should have and the other should not have to select his customers? In other words, why should section 3 apply to mine owners only?

Mr. NELSON. You heard what the eloquent and conscientious gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] said, and I wish to give him full credit, for he is an industrious, painstaking, and conscientious member of the Committee on the Judiciary. Yet I heard no such evidence before the committee that would cause me to say why they should select arbitrarily the mine owner. I see no reason at all for the discrimination.

Mr. ADAIR. I am interested in what the gentleman is saying and was trying to get information.

Mr. NELSON. I am very glad to give it to the gentleman if I have it.

Mr. ADAIR. Take an illustration. Here is a man who manufactures a certain kind of refrigerator that is his own idea of what is best. He goes through the country into the various cities and towns and establishes agencies for its sale with one merchant in a town, and that merchant probably spends more than his profits in one or two years in advertising that kind of a refrigerator, hoping to build up a business in that particular kind of a refrigerator that will make him some money in the future. Now, does not the gentleman think that a manufacturer should have the right to select his customer in the various towns to sell this particular kind of a refrigerator to, and does not the gentleman believe under such circumstances that it would be wrong to compel him to sell to any man in the town who sought to buy?

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman has asked me a controverted question as to which is the more for the public good, the right of the manufacturer to arbitrarily select his exclusive customer or to give the power to refuse to sell to a customer which tends toward monopoly. My own judgment is that in legislating on this question we ought first to destroy the monopoly before we go below and interfere with the everyday business practices. I would leave that open for the future.

Mr. ADAIR. It is a business practice?

Mr. NELSON. It is a business practice, and in many cases it works to the interest of the public to introduce a special article, but, of course, it may also be abused. That is a controverted question.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. That is what this bill has done; it has left it open, has it not?

Mr. NELSON. I think not by leaving it in the power of the manufacturer to select the customer.

Mr. HARDY. You leave it as it is now.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Under the present broad terms of the Sherman antitrust law persons engaged in selling goods, wares, merchandise in commerce are forbidden from selecting their own customers if such forbidding becomes a restriction in restraint of trade. Under this law persons engaged in selling goods, wares, and merchandise in commerce are absolutely protected in selecting their customers whether the agreement be in restraint of trade or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes more.

MACHINERY.

The machinery provided by the bill for the enforcement of the antitrust law does really nothing to make certain that dissolutions of trusts shall be real and not merely nominal. A repetition is still possible of the sham dissolutions of the Oil and Tobacco Trusts, which boosted trust stocks enormously but did nothing to bring down prices. As in the Tobacco case, the independents and interested States are still denied the opportunity to intervene to protect their rights. Little is done to make the antitrust laws self-enforcing. There is no way to compel an unwilling Attorney General to act. The Sherman law, despite its excellent provisions, has failed to prevent the rapid increase of trusts, because Attorneys General, for reasons of political expediency, have not enforced it in all its effectiveness. This bill does the least possible to improve its machinery so as to make it self-enforcing and readily available for the adequate protection of the public welfare.

ESTOPPEL.

The committee points with much pride to the provision of this bill to make it easier for independents to recover damages for losses sustained through the unlawful actions of the trusts; but when this bill is read, it will be noted that not only may the decrees in Government suits be pleaded against trusts, but also in their favor. Although the independents have never had their day in court, they are absolutely bound by any feeble compromise the Attorney General may make. And can we be certain that no compromises will be made in the future? Only recently a compromise was arranged by the Attorney General with the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., under which it retained an almost complete monopoly of the telephone lines of the country. Other dissolutions by consent are reported to be in progress. Do these compromises and this bill, which allows trusts to plead these decrees in their favor, safeguard the rights of the independents? In thus dividing the loaf between them, which gets the bigger end—the independents or the trusts?

PENALTIES.

No part of this bill has been so much extolled by its authors as the section that pretends to make guilt personal. The people are told that, instead of fining corporations, hereafter the trust magnates will be put in jail. But trust magnates have no cause for alarm. This bill plainly says, in effect, that they shall be subject to fine and imprisonment only when they can be conclusively shown to have personally done any of the acts forbidden by the antitrust laws. This is now the law. Trust magnates heretofore have so rarely gone to jail, because Attorneys General, for reasons of political expediency, have not asked for prison penalties, or because judges have suspended sentence. Why is it that under this administration the Mellen indictment has been allowed to run along for 18 months, and is anybody ever to be brought to trial? This bill still permits judges to suspend sentence. The prison penalties of the Sherman law are left as they were, and the maximum fine is still $5,000. Think of a $5,000 fine for the average American trust.

HOLDING COMPANIES.

This bill is represented to us as hereafter prohibiting holding companies; but big business knows that it expressly does not apply to holding companies already organized. Moreover, this bill makes the test of a holding company's illegality not whether it has potential power to lessen competition, in substance held to be the law in the Northern Securities case, but instead it introduces a new element, and a dangerous one, whether the holding company actually uses that power with the effect of substantially lessening competition. Upon this test the Northern Securities case would probably have gone against the Government, and it will hereafter be exceedingly difficult to prove that a holding company is illegal.

We are told also that a great reform is accomplished by the prohibition of interlocking directorates. But this part of the bill has no great terrors for Wall Street. It is merely an annoyance. Instead of dealing with the real evil, the interlocking control of competing corporations, which grows out of common stock ownership, it deals only with one manifestation of this evil, the acting of the same men as directors of two or more corporations. The common stock ownership is allowed to continue. The interlocking control may still be exercised through dummy directors, voting trusts, or in any other manner than that of interlocking directorates. The trusts have not taken alarm at this bill, because they know that, though interlocking directors are prohibited, competition will not be restored while common stock ownership is undisturbed. To the legitimate, independent business men of the country, however, this section represents a needless and unjustifiable interference with business ability and freedom.

FOR LABORER AND FARMER.

This bill also contains a provision which is represented to the farmers and workingmen as righting a great wrong. It is pretended that the organizations of the toilers of the land formed to better their conditions of life are no longer to be treated as if they were trusts; but, again, upon closer examination of the bill we find the truth. The partisan subcommittee, in fact, rejected the demand of organized labor that its activities shall be exempted from the antitrust laws. Farmer organizations are legalized only when they do not have capital stock and are not conducted for profit. This makes impossible cooperative buying or selling by farmer organizations. Public-spirited men appeared before our committee to plead that nothing should be done to check the movement of cooperation among the farmers; but the partisan subcommittee, acting, no doubt, after consultation with the President, would not consider any proposition exempting from the antitrust laws farmer organizations that have capital stock or are conducted for profit. Congress sent a commission to Europe to study methods of encouraging cooperation among the farmers. The Department of Agriculture is constantly urging the farmers to cooperate; but this trust bill, claimed to be framed in the interest of the farmers, refuses to legalize such cooperative efforts to better their market conditions.

The farmers are waking up to it. Here is a telegram that I received from a farmers' organization in my State an hour ago:

MADISON, WIS., May 22, 1914.

Hon. JOHN M. NELSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Our society, 12,000 strong, is counting on you at this time to champion the cause of agriculture in Wisconsin, which has already suffered from tariff legislation, by leading in enacting laws favorable to cooperation. Be sure to provide in impending antitrust legislation for free and unhampered cooperation in assembling, grading, standardizing, packing, storing, and marketing farm products. Agriculture must be permitted to do its business cooperatively; and business can not be done without capital. Would not a general provision permitting all cooperative business activities where all profits above operating expenses are returned to the patrons, producers, and consumers solve the problem? Anyway, it must be solved to save our greatest and most important industry in effecting economies in distributing and to protect consumers from unlimited exploitation.

CHAS. A. LYMAN,
M. WES. TUBBS,
D. O. MAHONEY,
Legislative Committee Wisconsin State Union American Society for Equity.

Time will not permit me to discuss more fully the provisions of this compromise measure. Sufficient has been said to bring out its real character.

THE SMALL BUSINESS MAN.

Mr. Chairman, what will be the effect of the enactment of this legislation upon the life and happiness of the American people? Will the small business man, the merchant, and the independent manufacturer receive this act with joy? There are no such indications. The small merchant, with his back against the wall, fighting for his very existence, came to the committee and through his representatives plead for relief against the crushing power of concentrated capital in the form of chain stores and department stores and big monopolies. What have you given him in this bill? Absolutely nothing. The independent manufacturer asked for larger business freedom. He may have mistaken his remedy, but what relief do you afford him in this measure? You arbitrarily place upon his business new restrictions that are vague, indefinite, and full of tempting loopholes. You burden, harass, and annoy needlessly independent, honest business. Surely the small business man, the merchant, and the manufacturer will not bless you for your efforts.

ORGANIZED LABOR.

Organized labor, representing millions of our countrymen who live by the toil of their hands in the sweat of their brows, have asked you to relieve them of being classified with capital. Their labor is part of their life, inseparable from them; and they have told you truly that it was not the intent of the framers of the Sherman law to classify their organizations with monopolies. It was organized labor that helped to put the administration into power. It asked for bread, but you gave it a bone. You pretend to exempt the workingmen from the law, but they know that your language is empty and meaningless, and that they are still subject to all its pains and penalties. Already their murmur of protest is being heard, but the President, so the press reports, will not allow you to give them relief.

THE FARMER.

The great army of farmers—will they thank you for this legislation? Not at all. They do not love you overly much now. You turned them over in your tariff bill to the tender mercies of competition with foreign countries. Through their representatives and organizations they joined labor in asking that the products of their toil be not classified with capital. Organizations of farmers are not trusts, no more than unions of laborers, and the Sherman law was not intended to apply to them. Farmers have acted separately and individually heretofore, and in consequence the return for their toil has been a pittance. Our progressive farmers everywhere are beginning to understand the value of acting together. Evidence was presented to the committee that East and West, North and South the farmers are cooperating to buy in larger quantities and to secure better prices through collective bargaining, but this bill puts this movement of the farmers under the ban of the law.

THE CONSUMER.

The consumers, your special protégés of the past, what of them? How they love you for reducing the high cost of living! You said it was due to the tariff; but has the cost of living come down? It was not the tariff, and you know it now. It was monopoly privilege; the power of the trusts to levy unjust tribute. Now, though you have the power, you weakly compromise. Will the consumers praise this measure? No; like lukewarm water they will spew it out of their mouths with disgust.

WALL STREET.

This bill is satisfactory only to Wall Street. You may have placated organized plutocracy temporarily. Big business appears to be satisfied, because you have done nothing. But you know that this bill will not stand the test of time. Many of you realize this, but you dare not run counter to the wishes of your master in the White House. You fear that the people will misunderstand your attitude if you go against the President. Do you not realize that his power is due to the confidence of the people in the sincerity of his promise to destroy private monopoly? When the people learn that it is the truth—what the Wall Street bankers are saying—that "the President is the most conservative force in Washington," the party responsible for this craven compromise will reap the whirlwind. You were intrusted with the fullest power. You had an unequaled opportunity; but when the time came you lacked the courage for a thoroughgoing solution of the great monopoly problem. You have disturbed everything; you have settled nothing. As one who with others began the fight against monopoly privilege and special interests and for the rule of the people and the rights of all more than 20 years ago and has followed the fight up to this moment, I say to you your action will not meet with public approval. The people will come to understand your unpardonable temporizing policy. Men who will not compromise for the sake of political expediency will take your place of power. The great fight between the mass of the American people, seeking to restore competition, and the privileged class, still retaining monopoly control, will go on, and it will end only when it is indeed made "impossible for private monopoly to exist in the United States." [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RAINEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to bills of the following titles:

S. 4168. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4352. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4552. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 35 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD].

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the bill to supplement existing laws against unlawful monopolies reported by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. CLAYTON, of Alabama, should command the support of every Member of the House. It is the mature product of the master minds of that great committee. It has received very careful consideration after a full hearing of all interests involved in our complex industrial system. It has both paternal and patriotic features. It is paternal in the guaranty of the civil rights of the great army of industrial workers, and the right to organize for mutual betterment and moral health. It is patriotic, because it involves the spirit of justice and a reverence for our Constitution and laws among the men and women who do the world's work. The impression has gone to the country that the proposed amendment to section 7, suggested by the representatives of organized labor, is too radical. This amendment is in harmony with the purpose explicitly stated when the so-called Sherman antitrust bill was under consideration, almost a quarter of a century ago.

The history of that very important legislation is needed to illuminate and instruct all persons and parties and organizations, because that record proves conclusively that it was the intention of the framers and proponents of this law to exclude organized labor from its provisions. This was well understood by the framers of the national Democratic platform adopted in Baltimore July 3, 1912. Here is the well-considered plank of the national platform touching this vital matter:

> The expanding organization of industry makes it essential that there should be no abridgement of the right of the wage earners and producers to organize for the protection of wages and the improvement of labor conditions, to the end that such labor organizations and their members shall not be regarded as illegal and combinations in restraint of trade.

The proposed amendment to section 7 is intended to carry out in letter and spirit the declaration of the Baltimore platform. Speaking as an individual, I desire to state that when this bill is under consideration during the five-minute rule an amendment will be offered which will probably allow section 7 in the bill to stand intact, with an improving sentence to make that section more lucid.

The claim is set up now by the opponents of this amendment that it is class legislation. This amendment is proposed as a protecting shield to about 30,000,000 of human beings in the United States who do the work of our ninety-five millions. If this is class legislation, how about the one hundred and forty millions appropriated this year for the Navy? How many of the 30,000,000 of wageworkers who are taxed on everything they wear and consume get any benefit out of this one hundred and forty millions? None worth mentioning, except the skilled workers in the navy yards. How many of the 30,000,000 of workers will get any benefit out of the two and a half millions of profit to the Armor Trust in the two-battleship program of 1914? How many skilled laborers will get any benefit out of the twenty-five millions voted for good roads? Is there anywhere concealed in this twenty-five millions of nebulous beneficence any benefit to any discouraged laborer out of a job? On the other hand, will he not find Jordan a harder road to travel?

How does this proposed amendment compare as class legislation with the $400,000 we recently voted out of the Federal Treasury for experiments in the eradication of cattle ticks? Have we reached a point in the evolution of our progressive civilization when the elimination of cattle ticks is more vital than the civil rights of the citizen?

We appropriated $200,000 this session of Congress to enable the Secretary of Agriculture, who is not a farmer, to give his views to the farmers on the marketing of farm products. And when this item was passed in a jiffy there was not an orator on this floor who would make an exclamation point that it was class legislation.

We appropriated this session $331,080 for the scientific investigation of insects and bugs and the Mediterranean fruit fly, and it went through the House in less than 10 minutes, with no question that insect legislation is class legislation. Yet, when the men and women who produce all the material wealth of the country ask for the protection of their civil rights, and do not ask for a dollar from the Federal Treasury, the claim is made that it is class legislation.

How does this proposed amendment compare as class legislation with the $500,000 voted slap-dab out of the Treasury for the eradication of hog cholera? Is it possible that we have statesmen on this floor who believe that the health of hogs is more precious than the health and betterment of the men and women whose labor and welfare are the dependable factor in the prosperity of the country?

Everywhere around the world where the benign doctrines of the Christian church find a lodgment in human hearts men and women believe that God created man for higher aims and a better destiny than the stupid and unthinking hog, whose head is always on a level with his belly. God made man erect, with head and heart above his belly, and the men of work, in brain and muscle, whose achievements and genius have made all there is of material value in this much vaunted and glorified Republic should have as much consideration in this historic Chamber as insects and hogs. [Applause.]

The preliminary history of this law is very valuable and illuminating. It proves that in the very conservative times of a quarter of a century ago, when the recognized leader of the conservatives in the Senate—John Sherman, of Ohio—was promoting this antitrust legislation, it was not even hinted, so far as I can learn, that the exemption of labor organizations from the provisions of the law was class legislation. Hence a review of this law is vital to this debate.

SHERMAN ANTITRUST LAW, 1890.

On February 28, 1890, Fifty-first Congress, Senator Sherman, of Ohio, introduced his antitrust bill in the Senate. It was referred to the Committee on Finance. On March 22, 1890, the Committee on Finance introduced a substitute for the Sherman bill. On March 25, 1890, Senator Morgan, of Alabama, moved to commit the bill to the Judiciary Committee; it failed to carry on a vote of 16 ayes to 28 nays. On March 25, 1890, Senator Sherman offered a proviso to be added at the end of the first section of the bill, as follows:

> Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between the laborers, made with a view of lessening the number of hours of labor or the increasing of their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture, made with a view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products.

The amendment was agreed to in the Senate without any opposing votes.

On March 26, 1890, Senator Stewart, of Nevada, made the following comprehensive statement:

> The original bill has been very much improved, and one of the great objections has been removed from it by the amendment offered by Senator Sherman (for Senator George), which relieves the class of persons who would have been first prosecuted under the original bill without the amendment.

Senator Stewart then added:

> The bill ought now in some respects to be satisfactory to every person who is opposed to the oppression of labor and desires to see it properly rewarded.

Labor was first prosecuted under the Sherman law, and that law has since been applied more generally to labor than against the monopolies it was intended originally to restrain.

I have in my hand a list of 101 cases where Federal judges have issued injunctions against labor organizations. This table has been carefully prepared, and I will print the same in connection with my remarks, showing the title and number of each case.

Mr. ADAIR. Were they all under the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. SHERWOOD. All after the adoption of the Sherman antitrust law.

The amendment to the act above referred to was made while the Senate was sitting in Committee of the Whole. On March 27, 1890, discussion of the bill was resumed upon the proviso exempting farmers' organizations and trade-unions from the act. The debate that day on that subject is worth more than passing attention. Senators Hoar, Edmunds, George, Sherman, and many others participated. Finally Senator Walthall, of Mississippi, moved to refer the bill and the amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report to the Senate within 20 days. The motion carried by a vote of 31 ayes to 28 nays.

On April 2, 1890, the bill was reported to the Senate by the Committee on the Judiciary, but the Sherman-George amendment, which had been agreed to in Committee of the Whole on March 25, was not included in the bill. Nevertheless Senators in charge of the measure assured representatives of farmers' organizations and the trade-unions that under no possible construction would the judiciary include such organizations under the provisions of the act.

On April 8, 1890, the antitrust bill passed the Senate, as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, by a vote of 52 ayes to 1 nay. It passed the House on June 21, 1890, and was approved July 2, 1890.

THE LITTLEFIELD ANTITRUST BILL.

On April 7, 1900, in the Fifty-sixth Congress, Representative Littlefield, of Maine, introduced bill H. R. 10539 for the purpose of amending the Sherman Antitrust Act, approved July 2, 1890. On June 2, 1900, while the bill was under discussion in the House of Representatives, the following exception by Representative Terry, of Arkansas, was added to the bill by a vote of 260 ayes, 8 noes, 76 not voting:

Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to apply to trade-unions or other labor organizations organized for the purpose of regulating wages, hours of labor, or other conditions under which labor is to be performed.

The bill was then passed with this amendment added by a vote of 274 ayes, 1 no, 70 not voting. The bill was sent to the Senate, but no action was taken by the Senate.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

On June 2, 1910, in the Sixty-first Congress, while the sundry civil appropriation bill was before the House of Representatives in Committee of the Whole, Representative Hughes, of New Jersey, offered the following amendment to the section making appropriations for the enforcement of the antitrust law:

Provided further, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the condition of labor, or for any act done in the furtherance thereof not in itself unlawful.

The amendment carried by a vote of 82 ayes to 52 noes.

On June 9 1910, the Senate, by a vote of 74 ayes, 16 noes, decided to strike the Hughes amendment from the sundry civil bill.

On June 21, 1910, the conferees of the House were directed, on motion of Mr. Hughes, "that the House do further insist on its disagreement, and that the House conferees be instructed to refuse to agree with the Senate." It carried by a vote of 154 ayes to 105 noes, 12 answering "present," and 119 not voting.

On June 23, 1910, Chairman Tawney, of the conferees, moved "to recede and concur," which meant that the House agree with the Senate and strike the Hughes exemption proviso from the bill. A very animated debate followed, but the motion by Representative Tawney carried by a vote of 138 ayes to 130 nays, 16 answering "present," and 105 not voting. This vote was one of the most important ever taken in the House of Representatives. This action estranged organized labor from the Republican Party, then in control of the House of Representatives.

It is not pertinent to this debate to bring the record down to date. It is sufficient to know that the question has been before Congress for over 24 years, and is still unsettled, and that it is vital to settle it now and to settle it right.

This is supposed to be a Government of law, and a Government guaranteeing the civil rights of the humblest of its citizens. Some magazine writer, a student of sociology, recently wrote:

We have escaped from a despotic government by a king. We have realized, after many centuries, that a king is only a man. Are we going to permit the growing up a despotic government by the judges? Are they not only men?

It may be added that the despotism of a king, or one man, is of the same odious force and flavor as the despotism of a judge or a bench of judges.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in dismissing the long-protracted case against Samuel Gompers and his associates of the American Federation of Labor has been cited on the claim that additional protective labor legislation is now unnecessary. But the Supreme Court did not decide any question vital to labor. As stated by a labor journal:

This blessed week the celebrated case was taken by the ear, as it were, and gently led to a side door of the Supreme Court and let out into the street—and on a technicality. Not much was settled save that three very good men were not martyrized, for that dear old statute of limitations was invoked as a means of ridding the Supreme and other courts of a back-action situation, which was easy to dispose of with credit to the defendants, but which was full of embarrassments to the courts after the fellow Wright—now in limbo on impeachment charges—had put it up to the courts to sustain his Dogberry decision, or reverse the decision and make the courts ridiculous.

The Journal of Labor of May 15, 1914, published in Atlanta, Ga., gives in a few words all that this Supreme Court decision means. I quote from an editorial:

The United States Supreme Court has without question dodged the great fundamental issues of whether (1) there shall be free speech in this country; (2) whether there shall be a free press in this country; (3) whether or not judges of the courts may usurp the functions of the legislative body and make law in their chambers by usurping power not authorized by statute and enjoining or restraining working people from the full exercise of their normal, personal, and inherent rights, thereby abusing and misusing the otherwise beneficent injunction writ.

As stated in the above paragraph, the Supreme Court has decided no fundamental question vital to labor.

The encroachments of the Federal judiciary, masquerading as the oracles of immutable law, upon time-honored rights guaranteed by organic law, is responsible for a large part of the popular agitation and unrest among the workers. In milder form these outrageous edicts of some of our Federal judges, notoriously Justice Wright, are patterned after the infamous Jeffreys, who voiced the aggressions of the Stuarts which led to the uprising of the Roundheads under Oliver Cromwell.

Call it evolution or revolution or what you will, a better and broader estimate of civil rights and duties has taken possession of the American people. It is the evolution of intelligence, based upon the assumption that they who toil and till should share in the harvest; that the workers in mines and mills, in steel and wool and cotton, should have a living wage and the right to organize, as all business and professional men and all religious and civic societies organize, in order to better their condition. All good men and good women are interested in improving the condition of the wageworkers. It is injustice and oppression that creates anarchy and fosters revolution. This is an ethical as well as an economic question. And now, in the presence of the anarchy and bloodshed in Colorado, in northern Michigan, and West Virginia, is the time to make a calm and diligent inquiry into the causes which provoked these deplorable conflicts. What do the records of the Federal courts disclose in injunction cases since the enactment of the Sherman antitrust law? I have here the record of 101 cases in which injunctions on labor cases have been granted. In the case of the Danbury Hatters the contention lasted for 10 years, commencing September 15, 1903, and ending January 24, 1913, resulting in a judgment with court costs against the hatters of $232,240.

Let me cite another notorious case that has excited more criticism and aroused more antagonism among the industrial classes than any case in the entire history of the Federal jurisprudence of the United States. On December 23, 1908, Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor; Frank Morrison, secretary; and John Mitchell, president of the Mine Workers' Union, were sentenced to imprisonment by Justice Wright, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, for contempt of court, upon the charge that they violated the terms of an injunction granted on petition of the Buck's Stove & Range Co., of St. Louis. As this case involves such rank injustice, I propose a brief review of some of the salient judicial atrocities. In pronouncing sentence upon these labor leaders Justice Wright exhibited such a malignant spirit and used such violent language and showed such alarming symptoms of pathognomonic hysteria that even as cautious and conservative a journal as the New York Evening Post referred to him editorially as exhibiting "an excess of heat and indulging in turbid rhetoric." [Laughter.]

This ill-tempered judicial harangue occupied 2 hours and 20 minutes, and only ceased when the judge had exhausted his vocabulary of invective. Then he emitted the following: "It is the judgment of the court that you, Frank Morrison, be imprisoned in the jail of the District of Columbia for a term of 6 months; you, John Mitchell, for a term of 9 months; you, Samuel Gompers, for a term of 12 months."

HONORED MEN JUDICIALLY PERSECUTED.

These three conservative officials of the industrial workers of the United States, all law-abiding citizens, left the presence of this cruel judge in silence. For thirty-one times Samuel Gompers has been elected president of the American Federation of Labor, covering a period of 31 years. All this time he has been constantly in the limelight, and during all these years of his wearing work for the weary workers there has never been even a suspicion against his honesty or his fidelity among the workers. He has always stood for law and order. He has opposed strikes and has for the past decade favored peaceful arbitration. He has opposed arraying labor against capital. He has devoted the best part of his robust life to every humane movement for the moral and physical betterment of his fellow workers.

Did Judge Wright give the law and the facts in this case? No; he did neither.

The first amendment to the Constitution reads as follows:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the rights of the people peacefully to assemble to petition the Government for redress of grievances.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERWOOD. How much time have I got, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. QUIN. Does not the gentleman think, to keep down judicial tyranny, we ought to stop the life tenure for judges—to elect them instead of appointing them for life?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I do not believe that in a Republic there should be any official, high or low, appointed for life. [Applause.]

THE JUDGE AND THE CONSTITUTION.

In commenting on this section Justice Wright said:

So, with respect to the inhibition against abridging the freedom of speech and of the press, the Constitution nowhere confers a right to speak, to print, or to publish; it guarantees only that, in so far as the Federal Government is concerned, its Congress shall not abridge it, and leaves the subject to the regulation of the several States, where it belongs.

In other words, this judge holds that a sacred right, guaranteed by the Constitution, that the supreme lawmaking power of the United States has no right to even abridge or modify, can be annulled by an inferior Federal judge. He asserts that the guaranteed rights of a citizen, that the supreme lawmaking power has no right to even abridge, "is subject to the regulation of the several States, where it belongs," and, further, this limber-minded judicial pettifogger says "the Constitution nowhere confers a right to speak, to print, or to publish." It strikes me that any mature citizen with as much gray matter in his cerebrum as a gray goose will understand that when the Constitution inhibits the abridgment of free speech that, by clear implication, it confers a right to speak, to print, or to publish. Justice Wright held in this case that a judge may do by injunction what Congress is prohibited from doing by legislation. Can there be any doctrine more dangerous to individual rights and personal liberty than this? It is an infamous doctrine, and a Federal judge holding such views is unfit to hold any judicial office.

SOME VALUABLE OPINIONS.

I am glad I am not alone in sounding a danger signal on the many and glaring usurpations of our Federal judges. These numerous and drastic injunctions against the workers have aroused much popular indignation and called forth severe criticisms from lawyers, jurists, and students of sociology. I quote a few specimens. In October of 1907 Justice Moody, late of the Supreme Court of the United States, said:

I believe in recent years the courts of the United States, as well as the courts of our own Commonwealth (Massachusetts), have gone to the very verge of danger in applying the process of the writ of injunction in disputes between labor and capital.

Hon. Thomas M. Cooley, president of the American Bar Association, said:

Courts with their injunctions, if they heed the fundamental law of the land, can no more hold men to involuntary servitude for even a single hour than can overseers with a whip.

Judge M. F. Tuley, of the appellate court of Illinois, used these words:

Such use of injunction by the courts is judicial tyranny, which endangers not only the right of trial by jury, but all the rights and liberties of the citizens.

Gov. Sadler, of Nevada, said:

The tendency at present is to have the courts enforce law by injunction methods, which are subversive of good government and the liberties of the people.

Prof. F. J. Stimson, of Harvard University, one of the greatest legal authorities, in his new work on Federal and State Constitutions, after citing many authorities, says:

These are sufficient to establish the general principle that the injunction process and contempt in chancery procedure, as well as chancery jurisdiction itself, is looked on with a logical jealousy in Anglo-Saxon countries as being in derogation of the common law, taking away the jurisdiction of the common-law courts and depriving the accused of his trial by jury.

Judge John Gibbons, of the circuit court of Illinois, declared that—

In their efforts to regulate or restrain strikes by injunction they (the courts) are sowing dragons' teeth and blazing the path of revolution.

Why is it that far more consideration is given in England to the rights of the wageworkers than in the United States? Let me quote from a recent law of the British Parliament:

Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty and with the consent of the Lords, spiritual and temporal, and the Commons in Parliament assembled, by the authority of the same: It shall be lawful for one or more persons, acting on their own behalf or in behalf of a trades union, in contemplation of a trade dispute, to attend peacefully and in a reasonable manner at or near a house or place where a person works or carries on business if he attend for the purpose of persuading any person to work or to abstain from working.

This in the land of King George, the hereditary successor of George III.

How do the descendants of the patriotic sires of the American Revolution like the comparison between the English "trades-dispute law" and the injunction record of our Federal courts, denying even the liberty of free speech to the American worker?

Shall the workers of the United States be compelled to turn for light and hope from democracy under an elective President across the Atlantic to the Government of a hereditary King?

Neither in England nor Germany nor France could the arrest and punishment of labor leaders of the type and conservative conduct of Samuel Gompers and his associates ever have been tolerated. Samuel Gompers is the ablest, most experienced, and most conservative labor leader around the world. Less radical than any of the labor group in the English Parliament or the German Reichstag or the Chamber of Deputies in France, he has for nearly half a century opposed strikes and boycotts and has given his best and most arduous efforts to prevent both and to reconcile the conflicts between capital and labor in order to promote the prosperity of both.

Labor demands and has the right to demand that laws be enacted making a fundamental difference between labor power and property. Labor power is not property, because it can not be separated from the laborer. It is personal. It lives only in the life of the worker and ends with his death. It can not be transferred like property. The Century Dictionary defines "labor" as follows:

Physical or mental effort, particularly for some useful or desired end. Exertion of power for some end other than recreation or sport.

Property is the product of labor applied to some substance of intrinsic value when perfected by labor. It is transferable, can be inherited, and does not die when the person who owns it or produced it dies.

What organized labor is now seeking is the assistance of Congresses and courts to restore the English common-law definition of property and restricting the jurisdiction of all courts of equity to its legitimate limitations, as it was universally recognized at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

What recourse have any people, even under a Constitution guaranteeing civil rights to all alike, when they find themselves in the clutches of judges, appointed for life, who are deaf to popular appeals for justice, and whose official edicts, however cruel and unjust, can not even be modified by Congress, the supreme lawmaking power? [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it has been my desire and purpose to discuss this bill in detail. The Committee on the Judiciary, of which I am a member, has given a great deal of time, taken much testimony, and worked with much diligence in its preparation. There are some items in this bill that are worthy of commendation; but taking the bill as a whole and all sections covering it I am quite sure that it would be unwise to enact it into law. With the conditions as they exist in the business world as a result of legislation heretofore enacted, my judgment is that the consideration of this subject ought to be left to the next session of Congress, or, better yet, to a future Congress, before it is finally considered. At this time we ought to give every opportunity to business to revive, if possible, and to get on its feet—adjusting itself, if it can, to the legislation that this Congress and the last Congress enacted into law.

For the reasons stated, Mr. Chairman, I can not support this bill. I would like to do so because of the high regard I have for the members of the majority of the Judiciary Committee that reported this bill. The distinguished chairman who leaves us, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. CLAYTON, has rendered to that committee distinguished service, and he has left it with the love and esteem of every member of it. Now, we have succeeding him one of our ablest and most splendid Members, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. With Judge CLAYTON and Chairman WEBB, the two members of the committee that have worked most assiduously, and perhaps had more to do with the actual writing of this bill, have been that splendid lawyer and statesman, the gentleman from Arkansas, Judge FLOYD, and the no less able and distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Mr. CARLIN. But regardless of my high regard for these colleagues of mine on this great committee, and of their sincerity of purpose, there is much in it that ought to be left out. I would like for an opportunity to discuss it in detail, but, as I said, I can not do so at this time because of being compelled to leave Washington this evening on account of sickness. I commend to the House the diligence of the Judiciary Committee, and especially of the subcommittee of the majority which wrote this bill. I can not commend the result of their work, this so-called antitrust bill, and my advice to the House is to defeat the bill for the best interests of the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, I gave long and diligent consideration and study to the antitrust laws upon the statute books, with due regard as to what the needs might be as to amending same at this time. My views are expressed in the minority views, part 2, of the Report 627, which in part says:

> The antitrust laws on the statute books at this time have been carefully considered by the Supreme Court and judicially interpreted through a period of 24 years, and if properly enforced are believed by us to strip corporations and trusts of any power to injure or oppress.
> No possible good can come from constant interference with business. It is our belief that business should have a rest from further legislation and be given an opportunity to adjust itself to the environment created by the existing antitrust laws as the same have been interpreted and are now being administered.
> The proposed legislation contains many new phrases and sets up new standards, all of which would require a period of years of interpretation by the courts before their full meaning can be definitely known by the business world.
> It is very undesirable to bring about such a period of uncertainty and doubt to worry and harass the business of the country.

Our industries and business are now in a turmoil and making every possible effort to get along under the existing Democratic tariff laws. Conditions are very bad almost everywhere. The results of the tariff law are apparent to all and can not be successfully denied.

Mr. Chairman, my judgment is that the American people have and will continue to suffer enough during this administration on account of laws it has already enacted. Let the antitrust laws remain as they are for proper enforcement and interpretation and do not let us add further trouble by enacting this bill. It will do no good and will do much harm to honest and legitimate business, now sorely pressed.

Comparing business conditions for the period from October 1 to April 1 of the present year with a like period of last year, we find that the imports under Democratic tariff were $13,000,000 greater than under the Republican tariff. More work for the foreigners. Less work for Americans. But the cost of living is higher now than when we had America for Americans.

Take another instance—materials used by manufacturers. During the period mentioned we find that under the Democratic tariff we imported $48,000,000 less than we did under Republican tariff. This is due to the fact that the foreign manufacturers are making the finished articles now and sending them to this country, to the disadvantage of our American manufacturers. This makes less work for our people and more for the foreigners. What about the two tariff laws for the same period as revenue producers? We find that during the first six months of that law—from October 1, 1913, to April 1, 1914—the customs receipts were $140,000,000. During the same period last year they were $165,000,000. During the same period the excess of expenditures for this year over receipts was $37,000,000. During the same period last year the excess of receipts over expenditures was $7,500,000. These figures show conclusively that the protective tariff is not only better for the American manufacturers and the American wage earner, but is also a better producer of revenue. In other words, it makes plain to all who want to know the truth that the Democratic idea of the tariff is disastrous to this country. What are the figures as regard foreign-manufactured goods imported into this country? The increase in imports of November, 1913, over that of November, 1912, was $2,000,000. The increase of imports in December, 1913, over December, 1912, was $7,000,000. The increase in January, 1914, over January, 1913, was $4,000,000. The increase in February, 1914, over February, 1913, was $5,000,000. The increase in imports of March, this year, as compared with March of a year ago, amounts to $8,000,000 to the credit of the foreigners. Now, look at the figures for exports of the same month. The exports in March, 1914, were $133,000,000; the exports in March, 1913, were $183,000,000. What does this show? That the goods we sold in foreign markets for the month of March this year decreased $50,000,000, as compared with March of last year. The figures also show that the imports greatly increased for the same month. How can anyone truthfully say that this Democratic tariff law benefits this country in any particular?

Men engaged in the productive enterprises of our own country stand idle while others engaged in similar enterprises in foreign countries are supplying our markets. The farmers find the products of other countries in the market which they have supplied during the entire period of our country's history. It would be impossible to exaggerate the demoralized conditions into which you have thrown our domestic affairs.

Our conditions at home are discouraging and depressing to laboring men and business men in every section of our country. Conditions at home are bad, but you have humiliated and made us ridiculous in the face of the world by your foreign policy—or perhaps I should say by your want of a foreign policy.

You are surrendering our right to control our own affairs in Panama to England and other nations that may claim any rights there. You are giving to Colombia greater rights in the use of the Panama Canal than you assert for the people of our own country, and giving that country $25,000,000 as a gratuity, and, besides, making an abject apology for taking the steps that made the construction of the canal possible. You are simply incompetent to manage the affairs of a Nation as great as ours. Your policies, while attractive in theory, can not be made to work out in practice. There has not been such a deplorable condition in our country since you were in full power 16 years ago. Speed the day when you shall surrender the reins of government to more competent hands, when the sound doctrine of a Republican protective tariff shall again be put upon the statutes, and also when a firm foreign policy shall be again our honored boast.

The deplorable and humiliating conditions in which we now find our country is too bad. It shames our pride in our great United States, the "land of the free and the home of the brave." It also hurts us to see want and suffering in this "land of plenty." Everybody feels it—cities and country. Farmers lose $65,000,000 alone this year from free importation of corn. Free meat, free butter, and so forth, add to his loss. But no one gets these articles any cheaper, do they? Five hundred thousand dollars a day is the loss to textile workers. Disaster faces every business and industry in this country, with the exportation of merchandise falling off $7,434,586 in a single month, and the imports of merchandise increasing for the same month, as compared with that of one year ago for the same month, April, to the amount of $26,446,263. We are sending less of our goods abroad and buying more from foreigners, and we should also remember that the figures here given tell only the beginning of the workings of this Democratic tariff law. Here are some more figures with regard to the goods manufactured abroad and brought here ready for consumption:

Imports of merchandise ready for consumption in March, 1914, showing increase compared with imports in the same month in 1913.

Products.	1914 values.	1913 values.	Increase.	Per cent increase.

Let me call attention to a few of the increases. For instance, on manufactures of aluminum the increase is 176.4 per cent. The increases on cotton cloths are 94.2 per cent. The increase on other knit goods is 719.8 per cent; on tinplate, 694.6 per cent.

On leather and tanned skins there is an increase of 144.8 per cent; on woolen cloths an increase of 324 per cent; on wearing apparel an increase of only 3.2 per cent; on dress goods an increase of 227 per cent; on all other manufactures of wool an increase of 707 per cent. The total average increase of goods ready for consumption during the month of March, this year, over the month of March, 1913, is 71.9 per cent. Then people wonder why so many of our mills are closed. People are asking why so many of our laboring men are out of employment. These figures tell the story. In the report of the Secretary of the Department of Commerce, just made, he states the value of the finished manufactures imported in six months. According to this report, there was imported in six months under the new tariff, from October 1 to April 1, of finished manufactures $228,000,000, against $215,000,000 in the same period last year, an increase of $13,000,000, which would represent a loss to American labor of more than $2,000,000 a month in wages.

The value of manufacturers' material imported in the first six months of the new Democratic tariff law is $469,000,000, against $517,000,000 last year. In other words, our labor worked with $50,000,000 less raw material during the last six months than last year.

The value of the manufactures exported in the first six months of the new tariff law decreased from $582,000,000 to $541,000,000, a loss in American trade of $41,000,000 in the last six months, or a little less than $8,000,000 a month to American labor.

These startling figures illustrate the unwisdom of recent tariff changes and call loudly for a reassertion of the historic policy of protection to American industry and labor.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS].

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to confine my remarks to the probable effect of section 3 of the bill under consideration on one of the greatest industries of this country, namely, the bituminous-coal industry. In discussing this question I wish to say to you gentlemen that I do not approach the discussion from a partisan standpoint, but I approach it with the sincere belief that if section 3 becomes a law it will destroy the small mine owner and the small producer of the United States engaged in the bituminous-coal industry. Section 3 reads as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for the owner or operator of any mine or for any person controlling the product of any mine engaged in selling its product in commerce to refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to a responsible person, firm, or corporation who applies to purchase such product for use, consumption, or resale.

You will note that I have emphasized the words "or resale." The presumable purpose of the Judiciary Committee, as expressed in its report, among other things, is to accomplish the following:

The design is to prevent those who have acquired or may acquire a monopoly or partial monopoly of mines from discriminating against certain manufacturers, railroads, or other persons who need the products of the mines in carrying on their industry.

And in another part of the report is found the following language:

By its enactment into law we make it impossible for mere ownership of mines to enable the owners or those disposing of the products thereof to direct the disposal of such products into monopolistic channels of trade. It will liberate from the power of the trust every small manufacturer who is compelled to go into the open market for his raw material and every person who desires to purchase coal for use or for resale to those who desire to purchase for use or consumption, and will afford to every such manufacturer an opportunity to purchase same for cash wherever offered for sale in commerce. The section expressly forbids the mine owner or person controlling the sale of the product of the mine to arbitrarily refuse to sell such product to any responsible purchaser, and thereby prevents the mine owner or operator from giving the preference to another and rival dealer in the disposal of such product.

Now, I am convinced, gentlemen, from what has been said here upon the floor, not meaning to impugn the motives or good faith of the committee, because I feel sure the committee is trying to do what it thinks is best for the people and the industries of our country, that section 3 was inserted in the bill without full knowledge or consideration of the past or present condition of the bituminous-coal industry.

In the first place, there is no such thing as a monopoly of the bituminous-coal industry of this country. The large number of persons and corporations engaged in mining bituminous coal prevents a monopoly of that industry. The only coal industry that I have ever heard mentioned as being in the class of monopolies is the anthracite-coal industry.

Do you know that, at this time, there are over 3,500 separate and distinct persons and concerns in this country operating over 6,000 bituminous and semibituminous coal mines? Not only is this true, but not much more than 50 per cent of the coal lands of this country are owned by the men who operate the mines thereon. As a matter of fact, the great majority of the small operators and producers, and a large number of the big operators and producers, lease the lands upon which their respective mines are established and pay royalties therefor on their respective productions.

The amount of capital invested in the soft-coal mines of this country in 1909 was $1,062,000,000. The number of miners engaged in this industry is nearly 600,000. The principal bituminous coal-producing States are Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, Alabama, Colorado, Kentucky, Iowa, Kansas, Wyoming, Tennessee, Virginia, and Washington. The output of the mines is worth about $450,000,000 per annum. Of this amount, over $300,000,000 is paid out in wages and salaries each year.

No country in the world enjoys such cheap fuel as the United States. At this time we are shipping coal from West Virginia and placing it in the New England market, after paying the freight charges of more than $2.10 per ton, at a less price than it is sold at the pit mouth at Cardiff, Wales. There is an overproduction instead of an underproduction of bituminous coal, and, due to the present bad business conditions existing throughout the country and the great competition in this business, since the 1st of January of this year the coal mines of West Virginia have not run on an average of over two to two and one-half days a week. I am informed that conditions are similar in other States.

Competition is so great and has been so severe for the past five years that Mr. E. W. Parker, of the United States Geological Survey, in an address delivered before the American Mining Congress at Philadelphia last October stated that the profit on coal in the States of West Virginia, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio for the year 1909 did not net 1 per cent on the capital actually invested in the plants in the four States. Business conditions in this country to-day are certainly much worse than they were in 1909. In the past 10 years railway freights, labor, and supplies used in the mines have advanced more than 50 per cent, taxes have about doubled, and other conditions pertaining to mining, brought about by State legislation, have gone toward increasing the cost of production; whereas the price of bituminous coal to-day is no higher than 8 or 10 years ago. In fact, coal is selling to-day at a lower price than at any time during the past 10 years.

Why, then, should coal be singled out for special legislation, conditions be made impossible, and the business be more demoralized? It would be far better for us to extend a helping hand to those engaged in and dependent upon this industry, so that the coal fields of the country could be conserved and profit enough be made to enable the mine owners to pay better wages to and to throw more safeguards around the men working in the mines.

You must remember that the price of coal at the mines is but a small part of the ultimate cost to the consumer, and experience has taught us that the public has suffered more because of the "middlemen" than from those engaged in mining coal.

Section 3 is vicious, drastic, and sweeping. In my humble opinion its operation will work greater hardships than those it professedly seeks to relieve, will prove detrimental to the mining interests of the country, and will upset and make worse existing conditions, now certainly bad enough.

The small coal producer can not afford to maintain selling agencies throughout the country. He may have a superior quality of coal that he is producing, and, as you gentlemen may know who live in mining sections, there are as many different qualities of bituminous coal and as many uses to which it may be put as there are grades of and uses to which timber or cotton may be put.

Assume that I am a small operator engaged in producing coal in the State of West Virginia.

In passing I might call your attention to the fact that there are nearly 900 coal mines in the State of West Virginia devoted to the production of coal and the making of coke, which give employment to 73,000 coal miners. West Virginia produces about one-sixth of all the bituminous coal produced in this country, and upon the coal industry of that State nearly one-third of its population depends for its livelihood. The great majority of the mines in West Virginia are owned by persons or companies whose capital is not large. This is true of the coal mines generally throughout the United States. A majority of the mines in West Virginia will not average over 400 tons production per day.

Assume further that I have a superior quality of coal that I carefully mine and prepare for the market. I am trying to specialize, and my trade and business have been built up on the quality, preparation, and reputation of my coal. My output is limited. In securing my labor and in making my expenditures I am compelled to look to the future. I have four or five regular customers who have been dealing with me for years and of whose custom I am reasonably assured. Suppose that some competitor, a big corporation, with whose coal my coal is competing in some particular market, desires to injure my trade or the reputation of my coal or to deprive me of my regular customers. If this section becomes a law, I would be compelled to sell to him such portion of my output as he should apply for. I would be required, upon demand, to turn over my production to him, to work me or my coal such injury as he might elect. What is to prevent him, under this section, coming and saying to me, "I want to buy your entire output this year," and thus leave me without coal to supply any of my customers?

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Do you think that refusal would be an arbitrary refusal to sell to competitors?

Mr. AVIS. I think, in view of section 2 of this bill, it would be. Under the circumstances just detailed, I should certainly enjoy the freedom of contract and have the right to prefer the customers whose trade I have secured by years of work and the expenditure of large sums of money; but it is provided in section 2 of this bill—

That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act.

It is thus expressly provided that a mine owner can not and must not select his own customers.

What is meant by the words "refuse arbitrarily"? The extent of the evil of section 3 depends largely upon the words "refuse arbitrarily" and "responsible person, firm, or corporation." Yesterday, in asking questions of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] relative to this section, I called his attention to the fact that the word "arbitrarily" had only been defined in one case—a West Virginia case. The court held that "arbitrarily" meant "without any reason therefor." There is also an English decision that holds that the word "arbitrary" means "not supported by fair, solid, and substantial cause, and without reason given."

Any mine owner can give a reason for refusing to sell his product. If any reason is sufficient, then the section will only be useless and unavailing. If the section means that a mine owner must give a sufficient reason for his refusal to sell his product, the language of the section is uncertain, indefinite, and confusing, and the evil effects thereof can be appreciated at a glance, because of the uncertainty of the construction that may be placed thereon by the courts.

Just look at the dangers that a mine owner will be exposed to. Some dealer might make application to him for the purchase of his product. The dealer might be perfectly responsible financially, but at the same time might be unreliable in other ways, or might have some ulterior motive and might intend to treat his coal unfairly. The mine owner might be doubtful as to his purpose and refuse to sell him his product for a reason, that to the mine owner was a good one, but which was not satisfactory to the dealer. What will the dealer do? He might immediately institute a criminal prosecution against the mine owner and expose him to the danger of a year's imprisonment in jail, or a fine of $5,000, or both; and might also bring a civil suit against him for three times the amount of damages the dealer may claim to have sustained.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AVIS. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. One of the things that puzzles me in this section is that we all know there is a wide difference between purchasers. One may be just as responsible as the other, but he may be tardy in the payment of his bills. He may allow his paper to go to protest, and one of the quickest ways to bring that kind of a man to time is to refuse to sell him under the present law, but what would you do under this law?

Mr. AVIS. Undoubtedly, that is true. That is one of the difficulties here. The words "refuse arbitrarily" are not only dangerous, but the words that you refer to—"responsible person, firm, or corporation"—are almost as dangerous. Who is a "responsible person, firm, or corporation"? What is meant by "responsible"? "Financially responsible" is not sufficient. A person may be perfectly responsible financially, but he may be my competitor; he may be unprincipled; he may want my coal for some unfair purpose; he may want to control my output; he may want to sell it under an incorrect name or substitute it for other coals or other coals for it. In that sense he is not a "responsible" person.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AVIS. I will.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it would be an arbitrary refusal to sell coal in circumstances such as detailed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] in the question that he just asked you?

Mr. AVIS. Hardly; but——

Mr. BOOHER. Now, here is a man, according to his statement, who is known to be slow in his settlements; he permits his paper to go to protest, and he comes to you to buy your property, but you say to him, "I can not sell to you; you are poor pay; your paper goes to protest." Is that an arbitrary refusal that would haul a man into any court on earth?

Mr. AVIS. I say frankly to the gentleman that in itself I do not believe it would be. But who is to determine as to the responsibility of the person who applies to purchase? What kind of responsibility is meant?

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BOOHER. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Would not he be a responsible dealer, with plenty of ability to pay, and yet would not pay until he was forced to do so?

Mr. BOOHER. That would be one of the strongest reasons why it would not be arbitrary. If he had abundant resources and was abundantly able to pay and would let his paper go to protest, he ought not to be trusted by anybody. A man has to protect himself in business necessarily. I want to understand this section, because I think it is a very important one. Now, in the case you illustrated you mined your coal, you put it out and got it ready for sale, and you had your customers who took all your coal.

Now, you say, "Suppose a dealer comes to me and offers to buy all my coal. Under this section I am bound to sell to him. My refusal would be arbitrary." Do you think that that would be an arbitrary refusal?

Mr. AVIS. I think so, under the provisions of this section and section 2 of the bill. I can not escape that conclusion.

Mr. BOOHER. You have mined your coal for us, and you have said to the other gentleman who came, "My coal is all sold. I promised it to Mr. Smith and Mr. Jones and Mr. Brown." Now, tell me how it could possibly be considered an arbitrary refusal for you to sell your coal to us instead of to the man who came to buy that coal?

Mr. AVIS. I am glad the gentleman asked the question, and if his position is correct—and I assume that his question states his position—then section 3 is absolutely futile and unavailing in view of what the committee has stated that it seeks to accomplish. The committee has stated in reporting upon this section that the very purpose of it is to compel the mine operator to sell to the first responsible person, firm, or corporation who applies to purchase his product and not to discriminate against such person, firm, or corporation for some favorite customer that he may have. If you are aiming at an abuse, that abuse must be the abuse of discrimination. If you are aiming at, as suggested, the big corporations that control the output of certain mines and refuse to sell, say, copper to certain manufacturers, then the section will be unavailing if they are permitted to say, "We will reserve our product for Mr. Smith or Mr. Brown or Mr. Jones," as the case may be.

Mr. BOOHER. Is not the object of the committee here the prevention of monopoly? Or do you say you have to put your whole supply in the hands of some big dealer? Is not that the thing they are trying to avoid here?

Mr. AVIS. I think so; but this section will aid the big dealer, and instead of destroying monopoly—and I am with the gentleman on that score, for I am just as much opposed to a monopoly of the coal business as anybody else is in this House—I believe and prophesy in all sincerity that this section will destroy competition, produce bankruptcy, and in time create monopoly if it is enacted into law, with the knowledge that I have of the coal business.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AVIS. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the opinion of the gentleman as to the latitude of the word "arbitrary." If this particular deal or that particular deal is not arbitrary, who will say whether it is arbitrary or not?

Mr. AVIS. That is what I would like to know. As I said a few moments ago, I believe the evil effects of the section depend largely upon the construction which will be placed upon the words "refuse arbitrarily." It is a dangerous thing to leave the words open without any definition of their meaning. If we take the ordinary and common definition of "arbitrary" and the definition that has been given by the courts, the word means "without any reason"; and if it means without any reason, section 2 of the bill will be useless and will amount to nothing, because every mine owner can give some reason for a refusal.

Mr. FESS. Now will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. AVIS. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that the one feature of the Sherman antitrust law that has given most trouble is the feature of the "rule of reason"—the question of what is reasonable and what is not? It has been in litigation ever since the time the word was used.

Mr. AVIS. Yes. I think the majority of the Judiciary Committee is trying to overcome some alleged defect of the Sherman antitrust law; but in this instance, instead of overcoming any of the alleged defects of the Sherman antitrust law, it is my opinion and that of the coal producers from whom I have heard—and I have had letters from a large number of them who operate in West Virginia—that section 3 will eliminate or destroy every small coal producer and dealer in this country, and will ultimately build up a monopoly of the coal business.

There are three classes of coal companies. To the first class belong the large companies which have tonnage sufficient to place their product in the different markets which they can reach, and they have sales departments with branch offices located in all of the large distributing centers, and in this way are not forced to employ agents to sell their coal on commission, or brokers who do likewise. Such large companies, therefore, are in a position to accept orders from anybody who may come to them in the respective territory in which they are located.

To the second class belong the companies which sell part of their product to their own representatives in certain markets, and which may give to an agent or broker, who may sell on commission, territory in which they sell a certain number of thousands of tons during the year. The sales which this class of companies may make direct are not restricted in any way, excepting by tonnage to supply orders, or by reason of doubt as to the payment for the coal, but in such territory as they give over to an agent, similar to the territory in the New England States which it given over to agents, it is not within the power of such selling company, under present conditions, to accept orders from anybody else within that particular territory.

To the third class belong the companies whose tonnage is not large, and which are not able to establish offices and put their own salesmen on the road to make sales, which are entirely dependent upon what is known as the agent or broker to contract for their tonnage, which sell the same on commission; and the coal companies which have a few certain customers to whom they directly sell, and it is the third class which will likely be destroyed by the provisions of section 3 of the bill, for agents or brokers will not make contracts with the mine owners unless they are given certain territory to sell in.

The great majority of those engaged in the mining of coal are men who have come from the ranks, men who secured their knowledge of coal mining by practical experience. A great number of these men have no knowledge of the sales end of the business.

There is a wide difference between the mining end and the sales end of the business. The people at the mines are not in touch with the peculiar and varying market conditions, and in the majority of cases when they have attempted to market their product they have not been successful. These mine owners are almost entirely dependent upon agents, brokers, or dealers, and these agents, brokers, and dealers are responsible for the expansion of the industry.

For instance, the jobber in Chicago, covering the West and Northwest, can sell West Virginia coal in that territory to much better advantage than the producer could. His traveling expenses are less; he is closer to his trade; and the trade itself prefers to buy nearer home. But if the jobber has to send men out all over his territory to work up a trade for any particular coal; if he has to advertise and circularize it, only to find, what would be possible under section 3 of this bill, that the consumer or a rival jobber or the operator himself could take that business away from him, then, indeed, there would be no incentive for him to push any particular grade of coal or to try to expand the market for the coal of any particular State.

The agents and brokers selling on commission, and particularly the small dealers throughout the country, could be driven out of business under this bill. Their customers could apply directly to the mine owners and compel them to sell to them, if responsible, and could thereby eliminate such dealers, agents, and brokers. This would be destructive to the coal dealers of the country who have given years of their lives to the upbuilding and development of their business and have large sums of money invested therein.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TAGGART). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AVIS. May my time be extended? May I have further time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. AVIS. I would like to have about 15 minutes, if I may.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Very well. I will yield to the gentleman 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. AVIS. Now, what will this result in? Suppose that I am a small coal operator; that a dealer is representing my coal in a certain territory in which, at great expense of labor and money, he has built up a trade. What, under this section, will prevent the trade he has built up from coming directly to me, and thus deprive him of the fruits of his labor in that territory? In any event, what is to prevent a large competitor from eliminating me as a factor in that particular territory by buying up my entire output, either by himself or through some other person or agent? Those are some of the evils that are to be met if this section becomes the law.

Another thing I want to impress upon you is——

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AVIS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I suppose the gentleman would concede that if he could present to any court the facts that the purpose of this buyer to whom you refuse to sell was simply to eliminate you, your refusal would not be held to be arbitrary?

Mr. AVIS. Absolutely; but how can I show that? I can not look into the gentleman's breast and know what motives actuate him when he applies to purchase my coal. Again, the section will be unavailing if I am to have the right to question your motives when you offer to buy my coal. And there is no more reason why the coal industry—I am referring to the bituminous-coal industry—should be selected for such special legislation than the timber industry or any other industry. It is true that coal is a natural product, but no more so than timber, no more so than cotton and wheat. I will concede that if the industry were in the hands of a monopoly it would not only be our right but it would be our duty to pass laws to prevent a monopoly of that kind; but when the coal business is in the shape that it is in to-day, when very few, if any, of the men engaged in producing coal have made a dollar during the last year—and I doubt whether more than a very few of them have made anything in the past five years—why make it criminal for the small producer to endeavor to survive? Why force him into bankruptcy because he can not compete with his large competitor, who has selling agencies of his own to dispose of his product? You can readily see that if I am a small operator and my customers are likely to be taken away from me, and I can not prefer them this year over some other applicant, as has been expressly provided by this bill, I will not know what orders I will be assured of next year. If I am deprived of my customers this year by one man who buys my whole product or, say, by a half dozen men who in times of strikes or scarcity of coal are not regular customers, and who buy my entire product, what am I going to do next year for customers? I will have to go out into the market and scramble for new customers and if I am a small operator, with a small margin of capital upon which to work, and can not promptly secure orders, I will have to go to the wall, and there will be no redress for me.

Mr. HARDY. Would you not be in better shape if other business were placed in the same category with you? I take it that if you could present to the court the fact that you were necessarily required to refuse to sell to one customer because you had other customers whom you had agreed to supply, you could not be held to be arbitrarily refusing to sell. But would you not be in a little better shape if section 3 were amended so as to make it apply to all business?

Mr. AVIS. I do not know. I have not thought of that. I know this, that section 2 provides that if I am engaged in interstate coal business I can not select my own customers.

Mr. HARDY. Except upon the theory that your business is already a monopoly.

Mr. AVIS. There is no one who charges a monopoly of the coal business. Living for 25 years, as I have, in a coal region, I have absolutely never heard of a single abuse that this section is stated to be aimed at. And I ask any gentleman within the sound of my voice to recall an instance when a responsible buyer or a responsible dealer could not purchase bituminous coal. The man who mines the coal and takes the risks must have the right, as long as he has no monopoly, to prefer and to discriminate in favor of his own customers, and to arbitrarily, in some instances, refuse to sell his coal to others.

Mr. TAGGART. How can a coal dealer be damaged if he is simply compelled to sell his product at the market price? You say there is an overproduction. Would it not help it out some if some one had a right to take your output and lay down the money for it?

Mr. AVIS. I will answer the gentleman's question by an illustration, if he will pardon me. Suppose the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is a large coal operator. Suppose that I am a small mine owner and have a certain number of customers. What is to prevent the gentleman from Texas, whose coal is in competition with my coal, sending his agents to me and buying my coal for this year, and when my customers find that I can not supply them, what do they do? They will go to some operator or dealer who can supply them, and they will probably be lost to me for the future.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield for a further question right there?

Mr. AVIS. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. Up to date we have said nothing about the price. I presume the gentleman had in mind the market price, as everyone else did. But if you had contracted to deliver your whole output to me, then you have a right to refuse the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. AVIS. The Constitution of the United States, in my opinion, would protect the obligation of such a contract. But I am talking of a case where the contract is not made and where I simply hope that the man who has been my customer for years will continue to give me his trade, and where he has been taken away from me by some person purchasing all of my coal and preventing me from supplying him. Now, will the gentleman permit me to answer him further by asking a question? The gentleman is a lawyer, is he not?

Mr. TAGGART. I have been charged with that.

Mr. AVIS. All right. Now, why should not the gentleman be required to furnish his services to the first responsible bidder? Why should the gentleman be permitted to select whom he will serve or not serve as an attorney any more than a coal operator, unless he has a monopoly of that business?

Mr. TAGGART. My services are not one of the products that nature has furnished, to begin with.

Mr. AVIS. I hope nature had something to do with it. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAGGART. Well, I have observed cases where nature seemed to have fallen short.

Mr. AVIS. That is doubtless true.

Mr. TAGGART. Anyhow, we will not bandy words over that. This section of the bill is intended——

Mr. AVIS. Will the gentleman please confine himself to a question, unless he can give me a little more time.

Mr. TAGGART. I will put it interrogatively. Is not this section intended to correct this particular abuse, to relieve persons who absolutely must have coal, and who have been arbitrarily refused by those who produce the coal?

Mr. AVIS. I think the answer to that question would come better from the gentleman. I know of no such abuse. Does the gentleman know of any such abuse?

Mr. TAGGART. I do not come from a coal region.

Mr. AVIS. But the gentleman comes from a coal-consuming region. Do you know of a single instance, or can any member of this committee point to a single instance where a responsible buyer could not get coal if he wanted it?

Mr. TAGGART. If that is the situation, there will never be a case under this section, if that happy condition continues.

Mr. AVIS. I am afraid the gentleman is not acquainted with the sharp competition that exists in the coal business in this country. And I want to say, in this connection, that a late report issued by the United States Government shows that the average selling price of soft coal at the mines in the United States is $1.15 a ton. On the other hand the same report shows that the Government is operating a mine in one of the Western States—I do not recall whether it is in one of the Dakotas or Nevada—and it is costing the Government $1.65 a ton to get out its coal.

The competition is so sharp and so severe that the mines have not for years been running full time. My remarks are directed to bituminous coal, for I know nothing about the anthracite coal region. I believe I did call attention to the fact that Mr. E. W. Parker, of the United States Geological Survey, stated that in 1909 the coal industries of Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, and West Virginia combined did not make but 1 per cent on the capital invested. I mention these things to show that there is no monopoly of the soft coal industry, and that the mine owners should be given the right to select their customers.

The coal business of the country is entitled to at least a little consideration. Let me call attention to one effect of the present tariff law. Prior to the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands by the United States those engaged in commerce between Hawaii and the United States had the right to secure the cheapest transportation possible. The result was that they availed themselves of the cheapest transportation, and if a Japanese ship or a British ship or an American ship, or whichever ship offered them the cheapest transportation, they patronized that ship.

We have a law that requires that all commerce between the United States and Hawaii shall be carried in American bottoms. Now, we had a protective duty on coal of 45 cents a ton. That permitted us to ship and sell coal to Hawaii. What has the Democratic majority done? By your taking off all the duty on coal and admitting it free we have absolutely lost the Hawaiian market to our coal, and it is now supplied by Australia in British bottoms.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AVIS. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman understands that the law of which he complains was made by the Republican Party, compelling passenger and freight traffic between the ports of the United States to be carried in American coastwise vessels. When we took over Hawaii a public official ruled that the Hawaiian Islands were a part of the coast of the United States, and did the very thing the gentleman complains of.

Mr. AVIS. Neither the Republican Party nor a Republican official ruled that the gentleman's party should take off the countervailing duty on coal so that American coal could not compete with Australian coal. That is what the gentleman's party did, and we can not now put a ton of coal in the Hawaiian market.

Now, I want to read, in connection with my remarks, portions of a letter received by me from a most distinguished gentleman of West Virginia, Mr. Edward W. Knight, who has given years of study to the coal business. I desire to call attention to the fact that he is one of the leading Democrats of that State. I wrote him about section 3, and he replied as follows:

> If it is the purpose of the bill to prohibit all preferences and discrimination by sellers of the products of mines as between customers or persons desiring to become customers, whether consumers or middle men, that purpose is both unfair and dangerous.
> Mining and selling of coal is not a business in the nature of public service; if it were, it would and should have, among other things, the right of eminent domain, which has always been denied by the courts, notwithstanding some legislative attempts to relieve hardships by undertaking to give rights of ingress and egress, drainage, etc., over the lands of others. Nor is mining monopolistic in its nature; certainly soft-coal mining is not.
> In the absence of a monopolistic character and of protection by a fixed schedule of prices binding sellers and buyers there is neither necessity for nor justice in such regulation of the business as is practiced with respect to carriers, telegraph companies, water companies, etc.
> The coal producer, like other merchants, has always discriminated, and I think must always be permitted to discriminate between customers or would-be customers. The best prices are given and should be given to the customer who buys the largest quantity or pays most promptly, or who buys at a time of year when business otherwise might be slack, or who makes a contract for a year or a term of years. Similarly in times of strike or shortage of product from other causes the coal producer usually gives and should be permitted to give preference to his old customers and to customers whose business would be most hurt by shutting down or whose shutting down would cause public inconvenience, such as manufacturing industries requiring continuous operation and water works, lighting and traction companies. It would be most unfair to require a coal producer to sell coal to a person who has never before been his customer, who is brought to him only by an emergency, and who will not be his customer again except under a similar emergency, when he knows or anticipates that the same coal is wanted by a concern that has been his customer for years and which he desires to continue to supply. It would be most unfair also to require a producer of coal to sell his coal to a competitor in order to enable the competitor to take a contract or to supply a contract already taken, which would perhaps prevent the seller from bidding on that particular contract or from taking other contracts for himself. An enterprising dealer might secure a contract and prevent the price being lowered by competition by taking the precaution to insist on buying the output of probable competitors for the contract for one or two months, preventing them from bidding on the contract and leaving them after losing the contract to look elsewhere for the disposing of their output for the remaining 10 or 11 months of the year.
> I have known business men of ample financial responsibility, but whose reputations were such that a producer who valued his reputation and that of his coal would not want to have his coal sold by or through them; yet such a dealer under the proposed law might force such sale. A small amount of superior coal in the hands of an unscrupulous man habitually dealing in an inferior coal might seriously injure the reputation of the involuntary seller of the superior coal and aid in defrauding the customers of the unscrupulous dealer—

How many men in this House can tell the difference between one kind of bituminous coal and another? And yet there is all the difference in the world—

> Also such a law might lead to most reckless and harmful dealing in "futures." A man of small responsibility might take contracts with the intention of filling them by virtually condemning the necessary coal if prices during the time of performance should be low and of not filling the contract if prices should be high. It would result in a complete demoralization of market conditions and put a premium upon business immorality. And the law would inevitably be taken advantage of by speculators in times where high prices were anticipated to the disadvantage both of more conservative producers and merchants and of the consumers.
> Finally such a law would practically prevent the maintenance of exclusive agencies. There is nothing else that is so vital a factor in the extension of a business to new markets as the establishing of exclusive agencies, whether they be middle men selling on commission or a branch office or agency of a producer or a principal selling agent. In either case the extension of a business in new territory means large expenses in the way of office rent, employment of salesmen, solicitors, clerks, etc., and advertising. It is the custom to protect the person incurring such expense by giving him the exclusive right of handling the product within his territory. And it would be most unfair to permit a coal dealer who is pushing the sale of one coal and who finds a customer who will not purchase his coal, but desires a coal handled through another dealer with an exclusive agency to insist upon a sale being made through him, depriving the exclusive agent of the other coal of the reward of his time, labor, and expense. In this aspect the bill would be paralyzing in its effect upon efforts to extend business and increase competition in any given territory.
> If the reasons which I have above indicated as possibly dictating a refusal to make a sale, or a discrimination between customers, and other reasons which might be given if this letter were not already too long, which might appeal to the honest judgment of a fair-minded business man, would justify him in refusing to make a sale, then the bill is not so objectionable. But in such case, it seems to me, that the bill would be a useless one, since the existing antitrust act suffices to punish an attempt at monopoly or the restraint of trade or elevations of prices by corrupt agreement in respect to any article of interstate commerce, and gives any party thereby injured an ample right of action.
> I have not considered the constitutionality of the section, which seems to me open to grave doubt, but for the practical reasons given the act seems an unjustifiable attempt to interfere with a private business—a business which has none of the privileges or benefits enjoyed by public-service corporations, and either vicious or useless.

I hope, under the circumstances, that the Members of the House will give this matter serious consideration before they further injure an industry which gives employment in my State alone to 73,000 coal miners and on which nearly one-third of the people of West Virginia depend, and an industry which is fraught with many financial risks to the mine owner and with many personal risks to the men who dig and mine the coal and face untold dangers underground.

When you take into consideration the many perils and dangers which the men who dig and mine the coal daily face, they should be the best-paid laborers in the world; and nothing should be done by Congress which would even tend to injure or cripple the industry in which they are engaged or lessen their opportunity for better wages and living conditions.

I will be glad to furnish the gentlemen in charge of the bill with a great number of letters pointing out some of the evils of this section. The gentlemen from whom I have received such letters had not heard of this section until I called their attention thereto. I did not know that such a section was in the bill until I came across it a few days ago, and I immediately communicated with those who produce the coal in my district and asked their opinion thereon. Without exception, every man who has written to me about this section is bitterly opposed to its being made a law.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AVIS. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I have received one or two letters that lead me to think that some people have the idea that this section is aimed against the retail coal dealers, so that a customer who was not satisfied with their prices could go directly to the mine and purchase coal.

Mr. AVIS. Yes; this section will not only injure the mine operator, but the dealers as well. The coal dealer who has gone to great expense to acquire a yard and teams and the other necessary paraphernalia, and to work up a trade by personal solicitation and expensive advertising, can be eliminated either by the mine owner or his customers, because if this section becomes a law his customers can purchase directly from the mine owner and the mine owner will be compelled to sell directly to such customers.

For this further reason I think the gentlemen in charge of this bill should not insist upon the passage of this section, and if they are going to insist upon its passage and are going to leave the words "refuse arbitrarily" therein they should at least define them so that the mine owner will not be left to guess what may happen to him if he is prosecuted or sued in the courts for any refusal which he may in self-defense be compelled to make to sell his product upon demand.

And you can see why. As I stated before, if I were a mine owner every person to whom I might refuse to sell my coal, however good the reason might be to me, would have the right not only to institute a criminal prosecution against me, but he would have the right to bring a civil suit for what he claims to be threefold damages. Therefore you can see the dangers and perils to which a man who is engaged in the business of mining coal may be exposed.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman permit one more question?

Mr. AVIS. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I am president of a college. We buy a great deal of coal. We always buy from dealers at home. Suppose I send to you directly for the amount of coal I want. Can you refuse to sell to me, although you do not know what my standing is?

Mr. AVIS. I do not know. That is what I want to know. Upon whom is placed the burden of determining whether the person who applies to purchase coal or other minerals is a responsible person or not? The seller? Is he to determine whether the person is responsible or not? Under this bill I can not determine.

Mr. FESS. I live in western Ohio, and the gentleman lives in West Virginia. I buy West Virginia coal, and I desire to buy it directly from the gentleman. I send you an order for it. What is your responsibility if you refuse to fill the order?

Mr. AVIS. I am subject to a possible $5.000 fine and to a year's imprisonment, or both, and I am subject to threefold damages if any ensue.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman think it is the province of Congress, under the power to regulate commerce, to regulate these particular contracts which do not in effect impede commerce or create a monopoly?

Mr. AVIS. I do not.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not taking away from the citizen the right to make a contract to sell a product where he makes no effort either to monopolize or impede or interfere with commerce?

Mr. AVIS. I am glad the gentleman asked me that question.

Mr. BARTLETT. In other words, unless a man so uses his own property as to injure others the freedom of contract exists in this by reason of the constitutional guaranties. Now, to say arbitrarily that you can not, when you are not undertaking to have a monopoly and have not a monopoly, when you do not undertake to interfere with commerce but simply to make a contract for the sale of a product, does the gentleman think Congress, under what is known as the commerce clause of the Constitution, can limit and restrict that privilege of the citizens to contract?

Mr. AVIS. I do not think so. I think that the freedom and right of citizens to contract in regard to their property can only be limited or restricted by Congress in some instances. If the contract or contemplated contract is for an unlawful purpose, Congress can lawfully legislate; otherwise I think such legislation is unconstitutional. I have not attempted to discuss the constitutionality of the section. This section does not prevent one competitor from absorbing another competitor, or competitors, but in effect permits and legalizes such absorption. In the Northern Securities case the Supreme Court of the United States held that one competitor could not absorb another competitor, and that if he did he violated the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. BARTLETT. The purpose of that holding company, the Northern Securities Co., was for the purpose of interfering with commerce and destroying competition.

Mr. AVIS. Absolutely; and that is the point that I am making about this section, that it will permit one competitor to absorb another competitor, although the Supreme Court of the United States has held, not only in the Northern Securities case, but in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases, that such absorption is unlawful.

Mr. BARTLETT. But unless we change the present antitrust law that law as construed by the Supreme Court would prevent that.

Mr. AVIS. But this will conflict with that and then where will we be?

Mr. BARTLETT. At sea.

Mr. AVIS. If this bill becomes a law, we will not know which is to apply to and govern sales to competitors of an entire output, the Sherman antitrust law or this law; and for that reason, and others already given, I believe that the small mine owners of this country, upon whom several hundred thousand of our laboring men depend, and from whom for every ton of coal mined labor receives an average of about 80 cents, will be left in uncertainty and doubt.

Mr. BARTLETT. I was not applying this solely to coal, I desire to say.

Mr. AVIS. My remark was addressed more particularly to coal because I know something about coal and I do not know so much about other minerals.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. AVIS. Certainly.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. I understood the gentleman to say that the prohibition of the Constitution against contracts applies to legislation by Congress——

Mr. AVIS. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that he did not think Congress had certain rights in regard to contracts.

Mr. AVIS. In regard to certain contracts.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. The gentleman does not think the prohibition of the Constitution relates to legislation by Congress, does he?

Mr. AVIS. I do. As citizens we have certain inherent and vested rights, and under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, Congress can not deny the right or freedom of contract as to private property, unless such contract is against public policy or for some illegal or unlawful purpose.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is not under the fourteenth amendment, but under another provision of the Constitution.

Mr. AVIS. I said the fourteenth amendment. I am glad the gentleman corrected me. I meant the fifth amendment, which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, when the currency bill was considered in the Democratic caucus I endeavored to have adopted an amendment prohibiting the interlocking of directorates in financial institutions. The caucus, in its wisdom, determined to refer this and similar amendments to the Democratic members of the Judiciary Committee with instructions to prepare and report a bill extending this prohibition to corporations engaged in interstate commerce, as well as financial institutions. Thereafter the President of the United States, in his message to Congress, urged the enactment of legislation along these lines, and in accordance with the direction of the caucus and the suggestion of the President, the Judiciary Committee has reported the bill now under consideration. In the time which I shall devote to the discussion of this measure I shall refer only to the provisions of section 9, the enactment of which into law will, in my opinion, do more than any other provision of the bill to destroy the concentration of credit which has hobble-skirted business and will restore competition and liberty of business in this country. This section is divided into three paragraphs. If I correctly understand the first paragraph, it is founded upon the old and well-established principle in equity that a trustee can not deal with himself. It provides that no person engaged as an individual or as an officer or director of a corporation in selling equipment, materials, or supplies to a railroad or other common carrier shall act as a director or officer of such railroad or common carrier—in other words, that no man can deal with himself under different names. Certainly no one can question the righteousness of such a provision. No man should act as buyer and seller at one and the same time. If an individual acting as an officer of a railroad company is permitted also to act as an officer of a corporation selling supplies and equipments to that railroad, then the corporation in which he has the lesser interest is in danger of suffering at his hands. In the case of a private corporation, it can only result in loss to the stockholders; and in the case of a public-service corporation, it is certain to result in loss to the public in lessening improvements and restricting the service. No honest man wants to occupy this inconsistent relationship, and no dishonest man should be permitted to do it.

The second paragraph provides that in any city of more than 100,000 inhabitants no bank shall have as a director or other officer or employee a person who is a private banker or director or officer or employee of another financial institution located in the same place. It also provides as to financial institutions not located in the same place that no person shall be a director, officer, or employee of two banks either of which has deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000. From the provisions of this paragraph mutual savings banks are exempted; and having in mind existing conditions, it also provides that a director, officer, or employee of a bank may be a director, officer, or employee of not more than one other financial institution, where the entire capital stock of one is owned by stockholders in the other.

The prohibition of this paragraph is founded upon the old and well-established principle that where their interests conflict no man can serve two masters. This system of interlocking directorates in financial institutions which has developed during the last 20 years, entirely indefensible as it is, has done more than all else to make possible the menacing concentration of credit in the hands of a few men. The man who controls the credit of the country can, if he desires to do so, control the country and the people who live in it. The control of financial power made possible by this system, together with the directorates held by the same men in the great insurance companies, common carriers, and industrial corporations, has resulted in the placing in the hands of a small group of men the power to say who shall and who shall not secure credit for the development of our great natural resources, and thus to decree the life or the death of business enterprises.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. CLINE. Do I understand from that section that a man could not be a director in a trust company and in a national bank and State bank?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The provision specifically exempts a banking corporation the entire stock of which is owned by the stockholders of another bank. My construction of it is that under the provision of this section a trust company operated in connection with a national bank, where the entire stock of the trust company is owned by stockholders of the national bank, would not be affected by this law.

Mr. CLINE. That goes directly to my inquiry.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is especially exempted from it.

Because of this condition we have the third paragraph of this section, providing, substantially, that no person shall be a director in two corporations engaged in interstate commerce either of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, if such corporations are or have been competitors, so that the elimination of competition by agreement between them would constitute a violation of the antitrust law.

The effect of this last paragraph will be to minimize, if not actually destroy, monopoly and open the door of opportunity to the American of intelligence and energy who has until this time been obstructed and restricted in his endeavors to develop business enterprises against the opposition of monopolies. We are told that the so-called "unscrambling of eggs" which must result from the enforcement of this law will injure the industrial corporations, because there will not be a sufficient number of competent men to properly manage the industries of the country. Upon its face this criticism is not only unfounded but is a reflection upon the intelligence and ability of American business men. For every director who will be forced to resign a directorate in any one of the great corporations of the country there will be found ten men equally as well equipped to direct the affairs of the corporation in the interest of the stockholders; and, having an undivided interest in the particular corporation which he assumes to direct, the stockholders are sure to benefit.

The responsibility of directors will be increased, and the elevation to such a position of responsibility of a man whose activities have been heretofore restricted merely to carrying out the wishes of others must result in an impetus to business.

This contention that the banks will be injured by this legislation is not supported by the testimony of Mr. Reynolds, president of the Continental Commercial Bank of Chicago. When he was before the Pujo committee he stated:

Q. Do you approve of the identity of directors or interlocking directors in potentially competing institutions?
A. No, sir; personally I do not believe that is the best policy. That is the reason I am not a director or stockholder in any corporation that deals with us. There is not a day that I am not invited and do not have the opportunity to do it. It has been my theory of the proper method of banking to adhere to that policy.
Q. You have found that you could succeed in that way, too, have you not, Mr. Reynolds?
A. That is true as to whatever we have done. Some people would say that we have been successful. I am a little modest in that direction.
Q. Have you not the largest deposits in the country?
A. With one exception, at any rate; yes.

The enactment of this legislation, applying only to the larger banks, will result in the voluntary adoption by the smaller banks of the policy prescribed by law for the larger banks.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. COOPER. Would the section about which the gentleman is speaking prohibit, for example, a railroad company from hiring a construction company, the officers of which are also the railroad company's officers, to construct a line of railroad?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Of which its officers were members?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Where a director or officer of the company which contracts to sell supplies, material, or equipment to a railroad is an officer or director of such railroad it is a violation of this section.

Mr. COOPER. I have in mind an instance where four or five men sat on one side of a table as officers and directors of a railroad company and made a proposition for the building of a branch line of railroad, and then stepped around to the other side of the table, agreed to the proposition, and contracted with themselves as officers of a construction company.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I would say to the gentleman that under the provisions of this section that would be a violation of the law.

Mr. COOPER. That branch line of road was a little more than 100 miles long and was built for the Central Pacific Railroad Co. The Patterson Commission, appointed by President Cleveland, found that to build that branch line cost only about $3,200,000, but that the Central Pacific Co.'s officers paid the construction company more than $8,000,000 for the work—a difference and profit of $5,000,000 and more, which really came from the United States Treasury.

Mr. WEBB. This section would absolutely break that up.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It would make it a violation of the law.

Mr. COOPER. I refer to a contract of the Central Pacific Co. with the Pacific Construction Co.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. This legislation, in my opinion, will also result in the reduction of the number of directors upon a board. As a result of the merger of many small corporations into a few large ones the number of directors have been increased in all of the great corporations. For instance, among the financial institutions, the National City Bank, of New York, has 24 directors and the National Bank of Commerce has 40. The consensus of opinion among financial leaders testifying before the Pujo committee was that the smaller boards would be more effective, and certainly the rearrangement would leave no ground for the objection that as a result of this legislation it would be impossible to find a sufficient number of competent men to act as directors.

The minority members of the Judiciary Committee conclude their report with the suggestion that the Sherman Act now forbids interlocking directorates in its general provision against monopolies in restraint of trade, and, therefore, needs no reenforcement. These gentlemen can not possibly believe that the provisions of the present law could effectively destroy or lessen this concentration, else, in view of the fact that before the Pujo committee this concentration and control was admitted by those really responsible for it, the Department of Justice under the Republican administration would have taken steps to remedy the condition. They criticize the bill as being unscientific because of its arbitrary limitations of the application of the law to the large corporations, and at the same time they bewail the fact that the enactment of this legislation will endanger the smaller corporations more than the larger ones. I agree that the elimination of competition between corporations doing business in a town of less than 100,000 inhabitants, or between industrial corporations having a capital stock of less than $1,000,000, is as wrong in principle as such conduct on the part of corporations in larger cities with larger capital; but this law is aimed at corporations which have been or are likely to do that which is hereby forbidden, and in the smaller cities and by the smaller corporations it is exceedingly unlikely that there will be formed any effective monopoly eliminating or lessening competition.

There may be isolated cases, but they will be exceptions and not the rule, and legislation must be enacted for the purpose of remedying the rule and not the exception. Again, we must recognize that in complying with the provisions of this section during the two years succeeding the passage of the bill many changes will have to be effected in the business world, and in the accomplishment of this legislation it should be our desire to restrict as far as possible the inconvenience to business. There is now no necessity to inconvenience the small corporation. Should it happen that those who spend their time seeking to evade the law hereafter devise some plan whereby the small corporation shall be effectively used to secure the same concentration of credit and control of business which has been effected by the present system in the larger corporations, then Congress can easily amend this bill so as to include in its provisions all corporations subject to its jurisdiction.

The minority of this committee, in the concluding paragraph of their report, express doubt as to whether the necessity for this legislation is so great as to justify the elimination of men of wide experience as directors. It would not have been surprising had they expressed this opinion two or three years ago, but in view of the testimony before the Pujo committee, not of muckrakers but of the so-called financial leaders themselves, it is difficult to conceive how any man can now doubt the extreme necessity for this legislation. So gradual has been the growth of this system of interlocking directorates, and so accustomed had we become to the control of our institutions being exercised by a few men, that when it was asserted there existed a concentration of credit amounting practically to a monopoly it was branded as demagoguery, and I am frank to say was received by me with little credence. But during my service as a member of the Pujo committee, I learned from the documentary evidence and from the testimony of financial leaders alleged to constitute the group in control of the credit of the country that 180 men hold 385 directorships in 41 banks and trust companies having total resources of $3,832,000,000 and total deposits of $2,834,000,000; 50 directorships in 11 insurance companies having total assets of $2,646,000,000; 155 directorships in 31 railroad systems having a total capitalization of $12,193,000,000 and a total mileage of 163,200; 6 directorships in 2 express companies and 4 directorships in 1 steamship company having a combined capitalization of $245,000,000 and a gross annual income of $97,000,000.

These same men hold 98 directorships in 28 producing and trading corporations having a total capitalization of $3,583,000,000 and total gross annual earnings in excess of $1,145,000,000; 48 directorships in 19 public-utilities corporations having a total capitalization of $2,826,000,000 and total gross annual earnings in excess of $470,000,000. In all, these 180 men hold 746 directorships in 134 corporations, having total resources or capitalization of $25,325,000,000.

We were told how private banking concerns, such as Morgan & Co. and some of the great trust companies acted as the fiscal agents of the railroads, controlling the issue and sale of securities. In the case of the Southern Railway the Morgan interests, under a voting trust, name the trustees, who deal with Morgan & Co., bankers, as fiscal agents for the sale of the securities of that railroad. Thus for all purposes they are able to deal with themselves, and it is small wonder that within the last 20 years no dividends have been paid upon the common stock of this railroad. Indeed, holding in their hands as they have the power to deal with themselves in fixing the price at which the securities shall be sold and the commissions they will receive for such sale, it is a tribute to the self-restraint of these gentlemen that they have allowed so much of the earnings of this railroad to go to the development of its property. At the same time, information as to the manner as to which the railroad issues are handled should be of interest to State legislatures when in their efforts to regulate a railroad they are confronted with the argument that legislation would amount to confiscation because the stock of the railroad has for years paid no dividends.

The sincerity of such pleas should be tested by an investigation of the manner in which its securities are sold. The bankers controlling the railroads control its securities. As directors in the large insurance companies, they can direct the deposits of funds of the insurance companies in banks in which they are interested. With these funds they can purchase the securities of the railroads in which they are interested at prices fixed by them, and then they can turn around and sell the same securities as investments to the insurance companies controlled by them at their own prices.

Now, it is difficult to understand how any man can believe that this state of affairs should be permitted to continue if it be within the power of Congress to abolish it by legislation. It is true that the late Mr. Morgan in his testimony before our committee could not see anything wrong in this system, but many of his associates disagreed with him. Mr. George F. Baker, one of his partners, a man second only to Morgan in the power he has wielded in the financial world, stated to our committee that this concentration of credit had gone "far enough," because in the hands of the wrong man "it would be very bad." It is only natural that every man should be satisfied with his own control and believe that it is for the best interest of all concerned, especially when that control has resulted in the accumulation by him of a vast fortune; but in view of the recent disclosures before the Interstate Commerce Commission of the manner in which the assets of the New Haven Railroad Co. were dissipated while that railroad was under the guidance and domination of Morgan & Co., there may be justification for doubt on the part of some of the stockholders of that railroad and of the public as to whether or not this control is now in the hands of the right men. For my part I do not believe that it is right that such vast power, carrying with it the control of the happiness of men, should be concentrated in the hands of any one man. When Mr. Baker, interested as he is, can bring himself to say that it has gone far enough, we ought to be justified in saying that it has gone too far. Since the report of our Money Trust committee, recommending legislation similar to that contained in this bill, Mr. Morgan, who succeeded his father as director of many enterprises in which they were interested, has voluntarily resigned from a number of directorates, explaining that he did so because of the change of sentiment on the part of the public as to such dual and inconsistent relationships. He was mistaken in believing that the sentiment of the public had changed. It has only awakened to the existence of this condition of affairs.

In our investigation we could not ascertain that either in England, France, or in any other country has this system of interlocking directorates been found a necessity to insure the proper administration of the affairs of financial institutions. In fact, the law prohibits the participation of brokers and bankers in their councils, on the theory that as those interests are likely to be dealing with the banks they should not be permitted to be represented on both sides of the bargain.

The laws on that subject are as follows:

Bank of England: Bankers, brokers, bill discounters, or directors of other banks operating in England are excluded as directors. (S. Doc. 405, p. 10.) Custom has enacted that the directors should never be chosen from the ranks of other banks. They are generally taken from the merchant firms and accepting houses. (S. Doc. 492, p. 67.)

Bank of France: Regents (directors) are chosen only from the commercial and industrial classes. The consulting discount committee is composed of 12 merchants and manufacturers. (S. Doc. 405, p. 190.)

National Bank of Belgium: The governors and directors can not be on the board of any other bank. (S. Doc. 400, p. 227.)

Russian banking law: No person is allowed to be a member of the board of management of more than one bank. (S. Doc. 586, p. 16.)

Union Bank of Scotland: No banker or stockholder is eligible as a director. (S. Doc. 405, p. 158.)

Commercial Bank of Scotland: Directors must not be directors of any other bank. (S. Doc. 405, p. 174.)

If instead of the continuance of this system, which in the opinion of Mr. Reynolds is "a menace," in the opinion of Mr. Baker has gone far enough, and in the opinion of the public has gone too far, we should return to the healthful rivalry prevailing in these countries, we will do much toward solving the business problems which confront us.

The Democratic Party has for years advocated the levying of tariff duties for revenue only, the enactment of a currency law, and such a revision of the antitrust laws as would destroy monopolies and restore competition. During this Congress we have given to the people a new tariff law, which has demonstrated the fallacy of the Republican argument that protection is necessary to the preservation of our industries. We have enacted a new currency law, which the Republicans promised to the people for years but failed to enact, and which is hailed by the country at large as the greatest constructive piece of legislation enacted in years, and now we propose to complete our program by the enactment of this antitrust legislation. So well considered that it will not disturb any corporation administered by men who believe in the fundamental principle of honesty in business and having in view the elimination of monopolies and the restoration of healthful competition, it is certain to result in the promotion of the prosperity and happiness of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the bill now under consideration I desire to submit, for the thoughtful consideration of the Members of this House, two letters, which I will ask the Clerk to read, from Mr. John L. Boyd, of Knoxville, Tenn.

He is one of the large and successful coal operators of the eastern Tennessee field, is a man of high character, and any statement he makes is entitled to the respectful consideration of the Members of this House who desire the enactment of legislation which will be fair and just to the business interests of the country.

Mr. Boyd has always affiliated with the Democratic Party, and, I believe, voices the sentiment of the business people of the country in his objections to the pending measure.

I join him in protesting against the passage of this unwise, unjust, and unnecessary bill. Big as well as little business in this country should be given a rest.

The Clerk read the letters, as follows:

THE PROCTOR COAL CO.,
Knoxville, Tenn., May 13, 1914.

Hon. R. W. AUSTIN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Many of your friends here, including myself, would like to know your attitude in respect to the proposed Clayton antitrust bill, which I understand is offered as a substitute for the Sherman antitrust law, and what are the prospects of its passage.

We look on it as a great menace to business generally, and we are very much in hopes it will not become a law.

Section 2 is in a sense almost confiscatory; at least it deprives the seller of any commodity of the exercise of his judgment in legitimate transactions, in that it provides that any person engaged in commerce who shall, either directly or indirectly, discriminate in prices between different purchasers of commodity in the same or different sections, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable by fine. This is giving to the purchaser of a small quantity the same price, rights, and privileges as a purchaser of large quantities, etc.

Section 3 makes it unlawful for the owner or operator of any mine to refuse to sell its product to a responsible person, firm, or corporation who applies to purchase such product, thus leaving the matter of responsibility subject to dispute.

These two sections, in my opinion, are productive of trouble and complication in business transactions, and will provoke no end of litigation. We may decline to sell a person, firm, or corporation on the grounds that from our viewpoint he or it is not responsible, and which at present would end the matter, but under the law as proposed he would have the right to bring suit against us, and if it should be proven that he is responsible, contrary to our investigation, then we would be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to fine and imprisonment, etc., as provided for.

The main force of the bill, it appears, is against the business interests of the country and in favor of those who do not furnish employment to labor. The prohibition of interlocking directorates may be justified as attempting to curb vast monopolies and prevent the abuses that have resulted from such relationship, in respect to large concerns, but if applied generally and to small corporations, including banks of reasonable size outside of reserve centers, would disturb business generally and would involve a complete reorganization of a vast number of corporations, and in my opinion would work untold injury. The proposed bill is drastic and, as stated, is practically confiscatory.

Thanking you in advance for such attention as you may see fit to give this communication, I am,

Yours, truly,

JNO. L. BOYD.

THE PROCTER COAL CO.,
Knoxville, Tenn., May 21, 1914.

Hon. R. W. AUSTIN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read the proposed Clayton bill, and if I have not grossly misconstrued it, it is one of the most dangerous measures that has been offered, and so radical a departure from the customs and methods of business generally as would involve a complete reorganization in all lines and demoralize generally not only in my line of business, say, production of coal, but in all lines. For instance, certain sections provide that it shall be unlawful and subject to fine or imprisonment or both for a discrimination in price as between persons in the same community or different communities. This would require every wholesale and jobbing house to sell its goods to the consumer at as low price as it sells to the retail merchants. The factory or producer would violate the law for a refusal to sell its manufactured product to the consumer at the same price that it sells to the jobber or dealer. The coal companies, the iron producers, lumber manufacturers, and, in fact, all classes of commodities, supplies, etc., would have to be sold to the small consumer at the same price the large railroad companies pay for such goods in large quantities.

Another section provides that it shall be unlawful and subject the violator to fine or imprisonment or both, for a refusal to sell any person who is responsible who applies to purchase. The manufacturer or seller might not be able to determine exactly the responsibility, and the results would be a suit for damages, besides the part the Government would take in respect to the violation. In short, as I view it, the effect would be to eliminate the wholesale houses, jobbers, and dealers, and reduce the business through the country to transactions between producers and actual consumers.

I believe you appreciate the fact that if the producers through the country were reduced to transactions with consumers only that no calculation could be made as to the extent of operations, because no contracts could be made for quantities that would allow operations of mills, factories, etc. The prices would necessarily have to be advanced in order to cover the cost of doing business under such methods to the extent finally, I believe, the cost to the consumers would be equally as high, if not higher, than from the middleman or distributor.

The general plan seems altogether impracticable. The business of the country has been built up for the last century on a principle that allows the manufacturer and seller to select its customers, exercise its judgment in respect to responsible trade advantages, etc., that this proposed law will entirely overthrow.

There is practically an endless chain of valid objections and disadvantages that might be mentioned to the general plan of the Clayton bill, and if I have interpreted correctly the intent of the measure I confess that I am unable to see anything but disaster in its operations.

Yours, truly,

JNO. L. BOYD.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HELVERING].

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, the specific work before us at the present time is to crystallize into legislation the last of the three most important pledges which we have made to the American people. In doing this we are at the same time offering to our friends in all parties the opportunity to show that their promises were made to be kept. We are practically all agreed as to the evils of trusts and of combinations; the people of the country are united in the determination that there must come a readjustment of conditions in the business world, and that this can be brought about only by a return to normal conditions and the elimination of the abnormal which have been brought into existence through the greed for gain and have continued to exist only by reason of legislative neglect.

The evils complained of have grown up quite often in a quasi-legal manner; special privilege had the power to have and to hold the best of legal advice and was able to live within the letter of the law while continually violating its spirit. It has taken time for us to realize by experience the loopholes in law which gave the opportunity for its violation, and we are now engaged in the work of legislating along the line which experience has demonstrated to be necessary.

In his address at the joint session of Congress, on January 20, President Wilson said:

> It will be understood that our object is not to unsettle business or anywhere seriously to break its established course athwart. On the contrary, we desire the laws we are now about to pass to be the bulwarks and safeguards of industry against the forces who have disturbed it. What we have to do can be done in a new spirit, in thoughtful moderation, without revolution of any untoward kind.

And that is exactly the spirit by which the Democratic Party is actuated. We would encourage every legitimate industry of the Nation and we can best do this by insuring to them fair play. We may, and undoubtedly will, harass the feelings of those who work illegitimately, but that is essential. Criminal laws are enacted, not because all men are criminals, but because honest men, and society in general, must be protected against the dishonest. Such laws are essential for the protection of society, and we believe that the legislation now under consideration is equally essential if we are to restore business to the plane of justice, throw down the bars which are keeping out the intelligent youth of the land from the field of opportunity, and give to the American people the protection which is essential if they are to be masters of their own destiny.

In closing the address before referred to, President Wilson said:

> I have laid the case before you, no doubt, as it lies in your own mind, as it lies in the thought of the country. What must every candid man say of the suggestions I have laid before you, of the plain obligations of which I have reminded you? That these are new things for which the country is not prepared? No; but that they are old things, now familiar, and must, of course, be undertaken if we are to square our laws with the thought and desire of the country. Until these things are done, conscientious business men the country over will be unsatisfied. They are in these things our mentors and our colleagues. We are now about to write the additional articles of our constitution of peace, the peace that is honor and freedom and prosperity.

In the desire "to square our laws with the thought and desire of the country" let us proceed to analyze the conditions which demand action on our part; be fair with those who differ with us on the questions involved and honestly and candidly discuss the legislation before us with a desire to have it so perfected that it will meet the necessities which have arisen and do so without danger to the business of the country or the bringing of undue hardship on legitimate industry.

There are those who profess to believe that the combinations called trusts are, in the main, good and are essential in the development of our resources.

They would have us believe that the present-day concentration of industry is in harmony with economic development and business efficiency; that by combination economy or production is secured and that the general public shares in the benefits accruing.

Also, that unrestrained competition is wasteful and destructive of human energy.

Theoretically, these propositions are correct; but in practice they fall down lamentably.

Once competition is crushed out, then the need of economic management and progressive methods is no longer so essential. The market for the inventor becomes one in which there is little, if any, competition, and as a natural result the incentive to spur on the inventor no longer exists.

Likewise, the destruction of competition leaves in the market but a single force or a minimum of forces actuated by a common and a selfish motive. Monopoly has the power to dictate to the producer of the raw material which it must buy, and it has the power to dictate to its labor the wage it will pay for the only commodity labor has to sell, and at the same time it is the absolute dictator of the price which the consumer must pay for the output of the monopolies. Such a centralization of power is a menace to the well-being of all, and, carried to its logical conclusion, it means the enslavement of the masses, the closing of the door of opportunity, and the centralization of all of the wealth earned by the brain and brawn of the American people in the hands of a few monopolists.

Let us see how monopoly is judged by those who can speak from experience of the evil which it has brought upon us.

The president of the Investors' Guild, in a memorial issued in November, 1911, has this to say:

It is a well-known fact that modern trade combinations tend strongly toward constancy of process and products and by their very nature are opposed to new processes and new products originated by independent inventors, and hence tend to restrain competition in the development and sale of patents and patent rights and consequently tend to discourage independent inventive thought, to the great detriment of the Nation and with injustice to inventors, whom the Constitution especially intended to encourage and protect in their rights.

That is an arraignment which is based on known facts and can not be controverted. Monopoly is fatal to invention and ever stifles initiative. Whereas there was in the past every incentive for the young man who had a new idea, to-day his market is limited to a field in which there is no competition, and even when he does invent something of obvious value it may never see the light of day, for its purchaser may find it more profitable to put it away unused rather than to alter machinery and processes. The man with a monopoly does not need to encourage efficiency and improvement, for his profits are assured, even if he never makes progress.

In line with the foregoing, and to show to what extent monopoly prevents efficiency, I would quote the following from the Engineering News:

We are to-day something like five years behind Germany in iron and steel metallurgy, and such innovations as are being introduced by our iron and steel manufacturers are most of them merely following the lead set by foreigners years ago.

We do not believe this is because American engineers are any less ingenious or original than those of Europe, though they may, indeed, be deficient in training and scientific education compared with Germany. We believe the main cause is the wholesale consolidation which has taken place in American industry. A huge organization is too clumsy to take up the development of an original idea. With the market closely controlled and profits certainly following standard methods, those who control our trusts do not want the bother of developing anything new.

We instance metallurgy only by way of illustration. There are plenty of other fields of industry where exactly the same condition exists. We are building the same machines and using the same methods as a dozen years ago, and the real advances in art are being made by European inventors and manufacturers.

How justifiable in the face of such testimony is the conclusion drawn by President Wilson:

I am not saying that all invention has been stopped by the growth of trusts, but I think it is perfectly clear that invention in many fields has been discouraged, that inventors have been prevented from reaping the full fruits of their ingenuity and industry, and that mankind has been deprived of many comforts and conveniences, as well as the opportunity of buying at lower prices.

It is my firm belief that monopoly does not secure economy of production, and the authorities quoted would go to show that my contention is right. Contending, then, that monopoly is indefensible as an economic proposition, as well as an ethical and moral one, the question arises, What is the best method to be pursued to eliminate evils complained of and bring the business of the country back once more to a safe and sound basis?

THE RADICAL IDEA.

There are those who would have us take a radical stand, and that we are not prepared to do. Because evils have grown up coincident with the growth of the trusts, and often directly traceable to them, they would have us run amuck and destroy. They forget that in order to do this the punishment will fall upon more of the innocent than of the guilty, for those who have brought evil upon us were cunning enough to provide for their own future, and in many cases they have taken the kernel, leaving the responsibility and the empty shell in the possession of innocent investors.

We want to punish, where we can locate guilt, and we want to punish individuals rather than corporations. But it would be neither seemly nor wise for this great lawmaking body to permit itself to be carried to extremes and legislate along the line of revenge. I stand with the President, who has so well put it in this language:

Constructive legislation when successful is always the embodiment of convincing experience and of the mature public opinion which finally springs out of that experience. Legislation is a business of interpretation, not of origination; and it is now plain what the opinion is to which we must give effect in this matter. It is not of recent or hasty opinion. It springs out of the experience of a whole generation. It has clarified itself by long contest, and those who for a long time battled with it and sought to change it are now frankly and honorably yielding to it and seeking to conform their actions to it.

We will not go far astray if we follow the conclusions drawn by President Wilson in the paragraph quoted. The legislation before us interprets the experience of the generation. It presents a remedy for the economic evils which have sprung up as the result of the destruction of competition. This legislation would cure, while our radical friends propose a surgical operation which usually kills. We prefer to cure and utilize for the general good the life we save rather than to kill and put upon the people an extra burden of economic waste.

HONOR DEMANDS LEGISLATION.

A study of the foreign trade of the United States will convince that we are a world power to be reckoned with. The development of this trade means prosperity and permanent prosperity, for it means the continuous employment of our producers in shops and in factories. How essential, then, it is that we, as a Nation, should cultivate this field and permit nothing to mar the friendly relationship upon which international trade is founded.

Within the past two years this country has fallen in the estimation of the people of many foreign countries, and the cause of this is directly traceable to the greed of financiers who were more concerned with the acquirement of wealth than they were with the legitimacy of the means employed to secure it. The manipulation of the finances of the Frisco Railroad resulted in loss to many of the residents of France, who were inveigled into investing in it at the very time when those on the inside knew that failure could not be prevented. The manipulation of the properties of the Boston & Maine and the New York, New Haven & Hartford roads has intensified the bitterness engendered, and it is not without reason that foreigners look upon us with suspicion. In every national act we have shown to the world our desire to be fair and just in our dealings with nations and our wish to lead only in the paths of righteousness and enlightenment. But the acts of individuals whose only aim seems to be the acquisition of wealth, regardless of ethics or morality, can easily sweep away that which it has taken years of square dealing to build up. This we must legislate against. We must do so if we are to protect our own people, and we are obligated to do it if we wish to win and hold the respect of the world. I believe that House bill 16133 will go far in the direction of remedying the evils complained of, and, so believing, I shall take pleasure in voting for it.

ADVANTAGES OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

Regulation of the issuance of stocks and bonds under the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission is a provision the necessity of which has been made manifest. It protects legitimate corporations, safeguards the investors and gives assurance as to the future financing of railroads so that dividends will be paid only on honest investment.

It provides for a trade commission, which will act as an active aid to the Department of Justice; will investigate and give publicity to the business of the various corporations; will see that the mandates of the courts are carried out and that there shall be actual observance of law, instead of an attempt to keep to the letter while violating the spirit.

It will prevent price discrimination in all of the territory of the United States, and thereby destroy one of the most effective methods ever used to break down competition. States have attempted such legislation, but their work could not reach the real evil, as big corporations could well afford to maintain a lower price within the jurisdiction of any State if by so doing a competitor could be driven out of business. With the passage of House bill 15657 this practice will be absolutely prohibited, for the same price will have to govern in every State, plus, of course, the difference in cost of transportation.

It will make it unlawful for the owner or operator of a mine or for a person controlling the sale of the product of a mine to refuse to sell to a responsible person who wishes to purchase. This eliminates the evils arising from the monopolization of coal and iron lands and lessens the powers which the monopolies now possess by the exclusive ownership or leasing privileges of such mines.

It prohibits exclusive and "tying" contracts, an evil which has contributed much to the cost of farming, as well as being a heavy burden to those engaged in many other lines of business. "Tying" contracts help to create a monopoly in local markets, and by so doing they are instrumental in determining an excessive price which the consumer must pay to the exclusive agent. Under this system farming implements have long been marketed, not at a fair profit on cost but on a profit based on the needs of the consumer.

It provides for the punishment of personal guilt, and thereby will, to a great extent, be preventive of guilt. Time has demonstrated that the greatest weakness in our law comes from the punishment of corporations and the neglect to locate and punish personal guilt. By penalizing corporations it is often the case that innocent investors are the real sufferers, while the guilty parties are free to again violate the law, in the hope that they might escape detection. By enforcing penalties against responsible individuals we put at work an element which will aid in the enforcement of the law, for fear of a jail sentence is often effective where less drastic methods fail.

It puts an automatic force at work to aid in making the law effective by providing that on conviction of violation of its provisions a corporation can be sued by all who suffered damage by its illegal acts; that threefold damages can be collected, as well as the costs of the suits, and that the evidence secured by the Government to gain a conviction can be offered as conclusive evidence by the parties claiming damages. It must be plain that few corporations will care to run the risk of pursuing illegal methods knowing that they will make themselves liable, not merely to dissolution, but for the payment of damages to all parties injured.

It will abolish the evils of holding companies and put an end to interlocking directorates, twin evils which have been largely responsible for the power of monopoly and to which I shall refer later on.

And it will, to an appreciable extent, put an end to the abuse of the writ of injunction which has worked so much injustice in the past.

There is not one of the changes and reforms specified which has not been demanded by the people. There is not one of them which will work a hardship to legitimate business. We are here not to destroy, but to build; not to harass, but to aid; not to impede, but to help in progress; and while here and there may be found those who will protest that the legislation will hamper them or interfere with personal rights or personal liberty, it will be found that in almost every case the complaint comes not from those who wish sane personal liberty, but rather from those who have profited by unbridled license and who desire no interference with their opportunities to exploit the American people.

NEED FOR REGULATING STOCK AND BOND ISSUES.

Seven years ago the Interstate Commerce Commission called attention to the advisability of having governmental regulation of stock and bond issues. No attention was paid to the recommendation. Last year, after concluding its investigation of the New Haven, the commission once more made recommendations as follows:

No student of the railroad problem can doubt that a most prolific source of financial disaster and complication to railroads in the past has been the desire and ability of railroad managers to engage in enterprises outside the legitimate operation of their railroads, especially by the acquisition of other railroads and securities. The evil which results, first, to the investing public, and finally to the general public, can not be corrected after the transaction has taken place; it can be easily and effectively prohibited. In our opinion the following propositions lie at the foundation of all adequate regulation of interstate railroads:

1. Every interstate railroad should be prohibited from spending money or incurring liability or acquiring property not used in the operation of its railroad or in the legitimate improvement, extension, or development of that railroad.

2. No interstate railroad should be permitted to lease or purchase any other railroad, nor to acquire the stocks or securities of any other railroad, nor to guarantee the same, directly or indirectly, without the approval of the Federal Government.

3. No stocks or bonds should be issued by an interstate railroad except for the purposes sanctioned in the two preceding paragraphs, and none should be issued without the approval of the Federal Government.

It may be unwise to attempt to specify the price at which and the manner in which railroad stocks and securities shall be disposed of; but it is easy and safe to define the purpose for which they may be issued, and to confine the expenditure of the money realized for that purpose.

I regret that while our committee had under consideration the amending of the law governing this commission it did not provide the legislation requested in the first and second recommendations quoted above. However, we go even further than the recommendation of the commission in providing for the supervision of the stock and bond issues. I firmly believe that it is the part of wisdom to do this; that it will give protection to investors, largely put an end to the flotation of water, and will be of benefit to every legitimate corporation, because the general public will have the assurance that a commission in which we all have faith has investigated the reason for such issue of stock or of bonds and gives its approval of the same. Further than that, the enforcement of such a provision will give us a better standing abroad with those who desire to put their money into American investments, for they will know that this great Government of ours is on guard and that there is a curb placed on the activities of those who would, if they could, market illegitimate securities.

OLD-FASHIONED HONESTY.

It is to be deplored that the rascality of men in positions of responsibility has wrecked so many of our best public utilities, but if we make full use of the lessons learned by bitter experience then can we gain by our loss and give protection to our people to-day and to the generations yet to come.

We have to some extent departed from old-fashioned ideals of common honesty and the justice upon which all of our actions should be based. In so far as we have done this, public confidence has been lost and suspicion holds sway. It would pay us to cultivate better ideals and learn a lesson from those who have placed personal integrity above aught else.

John M. Forbes, of Boston, conceived and built the Burlington Railroad. It was an honest road, built by an honest man, and one who used honest methods. In the modern world of finance Mr. Forbes would find no place. He would be classed as "old fashioned," "out of date," and an "old fogy." He had certain fixed rules by which he governed his personal conduct, and at an early date in his career he said:

I am unwilling to run the risk of having the reputation of buying from a company in which I am interested.

To-day we are discussing the necessity for legislation designed to vitalize the moral philosophy of Mr. Forbes and crystallize it into law. To-day men are eagerly anxious to run the risk of the imputation which Mr. Forbes resented, and we, with the knowledge that we are here to safeguard the rights of our people, are eager to put up barriers to prevent such iniquitous practices. We prevent public servants from dealing with themselves, prevent all Government employees from buying from companies in which they are interested, and in every way strive to remove all suspicion from those who hold a public trust. So it is that these men who are quasi public servants must be prevented from engaging in practices which are open to suspicion, even if they should be so morally blind as to desire to so engage. Mr. Forbes would not when he could, and we propose that representatives of high finance shall not if they would.

BAD FOR THE GENERAL PUBLIC.

We learn from the reports of the Stanley and of the Pujo committees that interlocking directorates practically control the bulk of the business of the country. That militates against efficiency, and the general public has to foot the bill.

In the first place, these men can not give the attention needed to the various branches of business which they are supposed to direct. Efficiency and success requires specialists, and yet here we are at the mercy of a ring of "Jacks of all trades" who subordinate everything to personal gain. The important contracts of the various companies are let to directors interested. Economy is supplanted by graft, and the gross earnings are often so manipulated that while the public is forced to pay for poor service and inefficiency, nevertheless the money so exacted never reaches the stockholders of the corporations, but is grabbed by directors who are in position to skim the cream so that none is ever distributed in the way of dividends. Read the history of the financial operations of the Frisco, the Rock Island, the Boston & Maine, and the New York, New Haven & Hartford lines and note how the stockholders have suffered in common with the communities served by the roads. Only the favored few on the inside were able to harvest a profit.

It is the stockholders and the general public who always suffer. Take the case of the New Haven road. For nearly six years the world of finance knew that ruin was inevitable, and those on the inside took to their cyclone cellars until the storm had passed. Of the New Haven stockholders, 10,474 are women and 10,222 hold only from 1 to 10 shares each. The directors, men high in banking circles, knew, but they never attempted to open the eyes of the stockholders. Many of them unloaded their own holdings in time and left the innocent purchasers to hold the sack, so that when the crash came it was mainly women in moderate circumstances and the estates of widows and orphans which had to bear the brunt of losses brought about by criminality, mismanagement, and high finance.

WORKING IN THE WRONG WAY.

The cause of failure of so many of the properties managed by banker directors can be easily traced. Such properties have been managed with an eye to present-day profits, present-day stock dividends, and selfish interest, rather than with an eye to the upbuilding of the properties and the safeguarding of the rights of the communities served by such corporations. As a result the shippers of the country are to-day paying interest on watered stocks and on investments which were pure graft. The business of the country is penalized because of the evil practices of the past, practices which law can not now reach and for which punishment can not be doled out. The railroads demand higher rates in order to be self-sustaining, when in many instances the money is needed to pay interest on fictitious or misapplied capitalization. If the increase is not granted, then business is paralyzed, and if it is given, then there is no hope of our country escaping similar demands in the future, unless we safeguard ourselves by enacting legislation along the lines suggested.

The men who have made fortunes by the indefensible practices complained of have long since "got out from under." The overissue of stocks are largely held by innocent investors—by the estates of the helpless innocent and in the hands of honest but misguided investors. We can not penalize them for the evils brought on by others, and while it may be said that we are by the proposed legislation locking the stable door after the horse has been stolen, we are in reality following the path of wisdom in locking the door, so that no more shall be stolen. By throwing safeguards around the present and the future we are taking the only possible step for the protection of the present and the future, and we harass no legitimate investment, but rather do we increase the faith of the investor, build up confidence which has been weakened or destroyed by vicious practices, and substitute healthy conditions in the business world instead of the diseased conditions which have brought to us decay and disaster.

INTERLOCKING DIRECTORATES.

The country is practically united in the belief that most of the evils complained of can be traced to the vicious source of interlocking directorates, and ever since the report of the Pujo committee focused the attention of the people upon the extent to which such community of interests controlled the business health—the very business life—of the Nation, the demand has been insistent that legislation be enacted to effect a cure.

As Louis D. Brandeis logically puts it:

The practice of interlocking directorates offends laws, human and divine. Applied to rival corporations, it tends to the suppression of competition and to violation of the Sherman law; applied to corporations which deal with each other, it tends to disloyalty and to violation of the fundamental law that no man can serve two masters. In either event it tends to inefficiency, for it removes incentive and destroys soundness of judgment. It is undemocratic, for it rejects the platform, "A fair field and no favors," substituting the pull of privilege for the push of manhood. It is the most potent instrument of the Money Trust. Break the control so exercised by the investment bankers over railroads, public-service and industrial corporations, over banks, life insurance and trust companies, and a long step will have been taken toward attainment of the New Freedom.

The deductions of Mr. Brandeis are strongly supported by the known facts. The report of the Stanley committee on the Steel Trust showed that the few men who control the Steel Trust are directors in 29 railroad systems, with 126,000 miles of line (more than half the railroad mileage of the country), and are also directors in many steamship companies. Through all these alliances the Steel Corporation controls transportation, not merely as carriers but as the largest customers of steel. These same men are directors in 12 steel-using street railway companies, including some of the largest in the world. They are directors in 40 machinery and other steel-using companies; in many gas, oil, and water companies, extensive users of iron products; and in the great wire-using telephone and telegraph companies. The aggregate assets of the companies controlled by these few men exceeds $16,000,000,000.

It can be plainly seen that by such control these men can catch the general public "a-comin' an' a-gwine." As producers of steel they sell to themselves as consumers, and are also in position to give to themselves, through their influence as railroad directors, special favors in transportation, when they can successfully hide from the scrutiny of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It needs no argument to convince that by the use of such power practical competition is made an absurdity. The Steel Trust is supreme in its sphere, and the legislation proposed is absolutely necessary if we are to look for relief.

It is to the report of the Pujo committee, however, that we must go if we are to get an insight into the wonderful ramifications of interlocking directorates. From this we find that two New York banks—the National City and the First National—with the Morgan firm, constitute the inner group of the Money Trust. George F. Stillman is the power in the National City and George F. Baker in the First National. The resources of the National City are about $300,000,000, those of the First National about $200,000,000, and while we do not know the resources of the Morgan firm, we have reason to believe that their deposits alone aggregate some $162,500,000.

Mr. Baker is, or was until recently when he saw the handwriting on the wall, a director in 22 corporations having, with their many subsidiaries, resources or capitalization of $7,272,000,000. Further than that, the directors of the bank which he dominates are directors in at least 27 other corporations, with resources of $4,270,000,000. So we see that this First National Bank has representation on the boards of 49 corporations, with aggregate resources of $11,542,000,000.

Here are a few of the companies in which Mr. Baker had influence, either as voting trustee, executive committeeman, or director; the list was prepared by Mr. Brandeis:

First. Banks, trust and life insurance companies: First National Bank of New York; National Bank of Commerce; Farmers' Loan & Trust Co.; Mutual Life Insurance Co.

Second. Railroad companies: New York Central lines; New Haven; Reading; Erie; Lackawanna; Lehigh Valley; Southern; Northern Pacific; Chicago, Burlington & Quincy.

Third. Public-service corporations: American Telegraph & Telephone Co.; Adams Express Co.

Fourth. Industrial corporations: United States Steel Corporation; Pullman Co.

Mr. Stillman is a director in 7 corporations, with assets of $2,476,000,000, and the National City Bank, which he dominates, has directors in at least 41 other corporations which, with their subsidiaries, have an aggregate capitalization and resources of $10,564,000,000.

The members of J. P. Morgan & Co.'s firm hold 72 directorships in 47 of the largest companies of the country.

Here is what the Pujo committee found in regard to the members of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. and the directors of their controlled trust companies and of the First National and the National City Bank. They hold:

One hundred and eighteen directorships in 34 banks and trust companies having total resources of $2,679,000,000 and total deposits of $1,983,000,000.

Thirty directorships in 10 insurance companies having total assets of $2,293,000,000.

One hundred and five directorships in 32 transportation systems having a total capitalization of $11,784,000,000 and a total mileage—excluding express companies and steamship lines—of 150,200.

Sixty-three directorships in 24 producing and trading corporations having a total capitalization of $3,339,000,000.

Twenty-five directorships in 12 public-utility corporations having a total capitalization of $2,150,000,000.

In all, 341 directorships in 112 corporations having aggregate resources or capitalization of $22,245,000,000.

And, as Mr. Brandeis succinctly puts it, $22,000,000,000 is more than three times the assessed value of all the property, real and personal, in New England. It is nearly three times the assessed value of all the real estate in New York City. It is more than twice the assessed value of all the property in the 13 Southern States. It is more than the assessed value of all the property in the 22 States, north and south, lying west of the Missouri River.

And all of the power represented by this wealth is lodged in the hands of a few men. Can anyone doubt the danger which such concentration permits? Can we stop to inject partisanship into a discussion over methods proposed to wipe out such danger? It is useless to say that the power represented will never be used to the detriment of the American people. We could admit all that, even when we have had innumerable object lessons to show that the power has been so used; but even if it were in the hands of men in whom we all had implicit confidence, it is too great a power to be concentrated—it affords too great a temptation to frail humanity.

But the Money Trust is not content to operate within a limited field. Its tentacles reach out and grasp the activities and the resources of the Nation, wherever these activities and resources offer opportunity for gain. Take the case of Boston, and it is typical of practically every large city in the Union. The banking firms of Lee, Higginson & Co. and Kidder, Peabody & Co. practically control the National Shawmut Bank, the First National Bank, and the Old Colony Trust Co., with resources of $288,386,294, fully one-half of the banking resources of Boston. The directors of these banks are also directors in 21 other banks and trust companies, and all together they are practically in control of 90 per cent of the total banking resources of the city. In fact, 33 out of 42 banking institutions in Boston are interlocked, and these have aggregate resources of $590,516,239, which is about 92½ per cent of the aggregate banking resources of Boston.

HOW THEY DO ABROAD.

Contrast the condition existing in New York, Boston, and, in fact, the entire country, with those in the older nations in Europe, and what do we find? The Bank of England, the Bank of France, the National Bank of Belgium, and the leading banks of Scotland all exclude from their boards persons who are directors in other banks. By law, in Russia no person is allowed to be on the board of management of more than one bank.

Such is the practice in countries where conservative methods rule. Here we have thrown conservatism to the winds, and a few men have by combination gained the power to make every activity of the people contribute to their selfish gains. The laborer is exploited; the farm owner has to pay an unnecessary toll all along the roads leading from his fields to the consumer; at every corner we are held up to pay a tax levied either by monopoly or vicious practice; and as a natural result the earnings of 99 per cent of the American people of the United States are subtracted from, to the end that the money reservoirs of less than 1 per cent may be filled with the proceeds of unjust tribute.

In the legislation now before us we offer to you the opportunity to cure the evils which bear so oppressively on your people and on mine. Will you join with us in legislating to the end that we shall travel along the road which the experience of other nations has demonstrated to be safe? We are not proposing to you any innovation; we bring forward no experiment and ask for your approval of it. Other countries have deemed it inadvisable to permit of combination which is a standing menace. You can see by the reports of the Stanley committee and of the Pujo committee to what extent such combinations are in effect to-day. Is it not better for you to join with us in curing while we can rather than to wait until the patient is dead and the people of our common country are industrial slaves?

NEED OF A TRADE COMMISSION.

In his recommendations in the message of last January President Wilson suggested the formation of a commission as an instrument of information and publicity and as a means of securing and disseminating the knowledge needed to correct evils in the business life of the Nation.

Such a commission is provided for in House bill 15613. The bill proposed lodges in this commission the authority now vested in the Bureau of Corporations, but at the same time it gives to this commission new powers, the need of which have been proved by experience. To a large extent this commission will have independent power and authority, and the bill removes entirely from the control of the President and the Secretary of Commerce the investigations conducted and the information secured. Hereafter this commission will have power to make investigations on its own initiative and make public such information as it deems best.

An abstract of the annual and special reports of each corporation, which reports are made obligatory by this legislation, must be made public by this commission. The faithful observance of such requirement can not but have a salutary effect. It gives to the investor an authentic guide as to the condition of corporations; shows to the public the physical condition, earning capacity, and expenses of all such corporations, and with this information available there is a protection given which can not help but be an important factor in eliminating unnecessary loss.

Speaking of the laws governing trusts, on January 1, 1896, Attorney General Harmon said:

> If the Department of Justice is expected to consider investigations of alleged violations of the present law or of the law as it may be amended, it must be provided with a liberal appropriation and a force properly selected and organized. * * * But I respectfully submit that the general policy which has hitherto been pursued of confining this department very closely to court work is a wise one, and that the duty of detecting offenses and furnishing evidence thereof should be committed to some other department or bureau.

In this legislation we are striving to act upon the suggestion and recommendation made by Attorney General Harmon more than 18 years ago. Since that time we have had three Republican Presidents, and for 14 of these years the Republicans have had absolute control of all branches of the Government, but it remained until the time when the Democrats secured full control before any attempt was made to provide constructive legislation to secure the things needed to make antitrust legislation effective.

It has been during the period from 1896 to 1910 that the trusts came to be a real force to reckon with in the United States. Under Republican rule they have waxed fat and have been encouraged by the party in power. They were looked to to finance Republican campaigns, were potent factors in fastening high protection upon us, and through their union with the banks and the insurance companies of the United States they have been able to hold all legitimate business of the country at their mercy. To-day it is claimed that 50 men in the United States control 40 per cent of the wealth of the country. Such a condition of affairs is intolerable. It is a menace to the well-being of every man, woman, and child in the country. We clipped away part of the power of these combinations when we revised the tariff and put the industries of the Nation on a competitive basis; we further emancipated the people when we enacted currency legislation and took away from the trusts the opportunity to manipulate the earnings of the people for their own advantage and for the undoing of the real owners of the deposits. Now we have the opportunity, by the enactment of House bills 15613, 15657, and 16133, to remove the last of the obstacles which remain to prevent competition; and when we do this we will have kept our promises to the American people and made possible the return of an era in which there will be a fair field and no favors for either the big or the little fellow—a field on which special privilege will not be allowed to trespass.

THE DEMOCRATIC WAY.

Some there are who do not believe that we go far enough in the powers which we delegate to the proposed trade commission in the bill introduced. If they had their way, they tell us that they would insist upon clothing this commission with judicial powers—the power to not only hunt up evidence, but also the power to try, condemn, and inflict punishment.

It is somewhat strange, but in nearly every case we find that such suggestions and denunciations of the measure reported comes from those who are or have been affiliated with the party which was in power for 16 years, and who in all that time witnessed the rapid and steady increase of the pernicious practices complained of without making one effort to put an end to them.

For my part I am convinced that a danger even greater than that which we seek to guard against would menace the American people if we were to place in the hands of this commission the powers demanded. It would mean a centralization of authority such as this country has never seen. It would put into the hands of a few men power to hold up the industries of the country, and in the hands of the wrong men it could be used to hold in office any party in power which might be base enough to use the machinery provided.

Here we give to this commission ample power to investigate on its own authority or on request of the Government. It has the right to go into the accounts, business, and all activities of the combinations under its control, and when illegal acts are discovered then the Department of Justice is furnished the material on which to base action, and it would be compelled to take action on the behest of this commission or else be discredited before the country.

That surely furnishes ample power for the protection of the American people, while at the same time it safeguards the rights of legitimate business and protects it from the attacks of any partisan commission. It is the Democratic way. Out of power, we denounced centralization and fought every effort made to clothe bureaus or commissions with authority which could be used for partisan advantage. In power, we are consistent and we refuse to permit of a centralization of power which might inure to our advantage. It is our aim to protect legitimate business, not to harass it; to provide the means to run down illegitimate practices and to root them out. Under the authority granted by this legislation we have the power to gain the ends desired by our people. Anything less would be unsatisfactory; anything more would be dangerous.

WITH MALICE TOWARD NONE.

The Democratic Party has no quarrel with legitimate business, and never has had. The message of President Wilson in January was one of reassurance, and in that spirit it was accepted by the world of business. He voiced the opinion of the American people that competition must be restored; that indefensible methods had been employed by the combinations known as trusts, and that legislation was needed in order to safeguard the American people, as a whole, and the business of the Nation, little as well as big. The necessity for such legislation has been admitted by the platforms of all political parties. We were agreed as to the existing evils which required remedying; we disagreed only as to remedies. The President pointed out the things which, in his opinion, needed our attention, and the responses from all sources showed remarkable accord with his views. The plain citizen favored legislation suggested because he looked to see it put an end to practices which he had denounced; the small manufacturer and business man indorsed the message, for it gave to him hope for the future, and while the men who had profited by the evils complained of could not be expected to grow enthusiastic over prospective legislation which would do away with their illegitimate gains, nevertheless they realized that the American people, long sorely tried, would not be content under further oppression.

It is in the spirit breathed by President Wilson that our committees have acted in preparing and presenting the bills before us. It is in that spirit that we, as Democrats, are considering the legislation. We have no quarrel with wealth honestly acquired, nor with profits legitimately secured. But we would be faithless as Representatives did we not demand that a stop shall be put to monopoly and that no business shall be so big that it shall be greater than our laws or superior to our control. Equal rights and equal privileges we are prepared to grant to all. To give less would mean that we are false to the teachings of the founders of our party; to give more would mean that we are embarking in a policy of giving special privileges from which we hoped to derive partisan advantage. Within our confines we have a market for the products of most of our American industries. By tariff legislation we have paved the way for the opening up of new markets which will give opportunities for the expansion of our industries. By currency legislation we provide for the legitimate circulation of money along natural lines; for the aiding of our foreign trade by means of branch banks abroad and by means of bank acceptances. Out of this legislation is bound to come vast benefit to American industries, and in the resulting benefit all of our people will share. Now, we lay down the command that business must be conducted fairly, legally, and in the open. The legitimate business man will welcome legislation which so provides, and with the illegitimate we can not afford to compromise. Our duty is to act equitably and in the best interests of our constituents. That I believe we are doing in supporting these measures, and with their enactment will result the fulfillment of three of our most important pledges to the people—revision of the tariff, reform of the currency system, and the elimination of trust evils. It is a wonderful program of legislation to be compressed within two years, and if we accomplish it, it will be because we have an administration which kept the faith and a Congress which has recognized but one master—the American people.

A WORTHY LEADER.

President Wilson has pointed out the road on which we are traveling to-day—the road to the new freedom. Keen in intellect, strong in his faith in the American people, and swayed only by an honest desire to be an instrument of service, his evident sincerity and honesty of purpose has broken down opposition and won for him a niche in the affections of all who admire honesty, courage, and truth. He realizes better than any man in modern public life the value of the victories of peace, and while he is militant in battling for the right, yet ever are his weapons those of light and truth. As I contemplate his career since he came into the arena of politics; as I analyze his career as governor of New Jersey and as President of the United States and note the patience, faith, and sublime courage always in evidence, there comes to my mind a poem by John Greenleaf Whittier, the lines of the last two verses of which well serve as a portrait of the man. They run:

The truths ye urge are borne abroad
By every wind and tide:
The voice of nature and of God
Speaks out upon your side.

The weapons which your hands have forged
Are those which heaven have wrought—
Light, truth, and love; your battle ground
The free, broad field of thought.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SIMS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

On May 16, 1914:

H. R. 15503. An act authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to the Republic of Chile; and

S. 4553. An act to authorize the appointment of an ambassador to Argentina.

On May 21, 1914:

S. 5552. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Gordon W. Nelson," approved May 9, 1914.

On May 22, 1914:

S. J. Res. 139. Joint resolution to authorize the President to grant leave of absence to an officer of the Corps of Engineers for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Government of China on works of conservation and public improvement; and

S. 5066. An act to increase the authorization for a public building at Osage City, Kans.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, it is certainly remarkable that the majority of the great Judiciary Committee, bringing in this bill for the purpose of supplementing the Sherman antitrust law and strengthening it, and to suppress monopoly and to prevent unfair discrimination, have in the very first two sections of their bill been guilty of gross, rank, unfair discrimination against hundreds of men living in my district engaged in the bituminous-coal-mining industry. The only justification I have heard so far given for this act is that God put the mineral in the earth. That was the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MITCHELL], and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD]. They said that it was unlike a product that came forth from the factory, that evolved from the brain and labor of some man in a manufacturing plant. I can not get the distinction in my mind. It seems to me that God also caused the timber to grow from the earth as much as putting the mineral into the earth. There has been more talk about the Lumber Trust in this country than there has been about any Coal Trust, I think, in the last 20 years, and I can not understand why this exemption or provision or, as you might call it, proviso in section 3 should not apply to the lumbermen.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SWITZER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman vote for the bill if amended so as to include the words "products of the forest"?

Mr. SWITZER. I will not say so now. [Laughter.] I am giving you my reasons for being against this bill.

Now, let us see about this matter. I do not know very much about the bituminous-coal-mining industry. I do not know very much about metalliferous mining. But on my short visit up into the State of Michigan last winter I found that it took a very bright, active brain and a great deal of labor to go away down into the earth and there drill and blast out the rock that contains the copper and take it to the surface and run it through those great crushing machines, and finally transport it to the lake, where there is abundance of water, and after recrushing and grinding it in the stamping mills, using 15 tons of water on every ton of rock, eliminate and separate the copper from the rock, and then put it through a smelting plant.

If that is not as much a manufactured product as the product of a man who, with a ax, cuts down a tree and then runs it through a sawmill and cuts it into lumber, then I do not know anything about the manufacturing business. Which requires the greater exercise of brain or the greater amount of labor—the product of the metalliferous mine in northern Michigan and in Montana or the product of the sawmill of the lumbermen in North Carolina, in Maine, or in Arkansas?

Now, I am not accusing these gentlemen of doing this deliberately, but you know we all work along the lines of least resistance, and I find that a Representative with a good many poor constituents can howl long and loud for a heavy tax on large incomes without having any fear of trouble with his constituency. [Laughter.] So it is with the gentlemen when they bring in a bill here that discriminates against the mine owner and operator. Having no mining industries in their own districts, except perhaps one or two instances, of course they know they will not have much trouble at home. If they put into this bill provisions affecting the lumbermen and the other people that ought, on the same theory, to be in here, there would be such a howl go up all over this country that you would not hear any more demands to enact antitrust legislation at this session.

Now, gentlemen, I happen to live in a district where one of the main industries is coal mining. I am not myself interested in the mining industry. I was interested in it at one time to my sorrow. That industry in my native county has not been very much developed. But I got interested in the industry in an adjoining county, as I say, to my sorrow; and as to the mine that I was interested in some years ago there is no danger of your hurting it. It has gone up the flume, and my investment has gone with it; and for that reason, of course, I have considerable sympathy for the small coal operator or mine operator in southeastern Ohio who is struggling at this time for an existence. I can corroborate the statement of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS] with the evidence of a great many mine operators, and I believe a majority of the small mine operators there have been carried along by bankers and have been in the last few years almost hopeless bankrupts. There are at least 50 independent mines in my district more or less engaged in interstate commerce, and hundreds of persons are interested in those mines. There are two or three large companies, like the Sunday Creek Coal Co., that have mines in my district, and the Superior Coal Co., that has a large investment. The situation to-day is that the laborers, the coal miners, are out of employment. There are five or six thousand of them out in my district and about 45,000 of them out in the State of Ohio. I see by a newspaper that they are asking 5 cents per ton more on the run-of-mine basis under a law that has been enacted in Ohio than the operators will at this time agree to pay. They are probably entitled to it; at least they are certainly entitled to a living wage. The mine owners and operators say that under the business conditions at present prevailing in this country they can not pay it. The miners are out of employment—they are out on a strike and receiving strike benefits. I think one week's benefits to those miners in Ohio will exhaust their whole strike-benefit fund in their Local No. 5. It will require $150,000 or $200,000 every week to pay the benefits if these 45,000 remain out on strike, which will have to be borne by the labor organizations of this country.

Now, with this condition existing, with the families of these men suffering, and with the operators saying that they can not afford to pay a living wage, as demanded by these coal miners, I am asked here to vote for a measure that seems to me is bound to impose further burdens and greater hardships upon the coal operators and mine owners in my district and throughout the State of Ohio, and which will further embarrass them and possibly deter them from acceding to the demands of the miners and thereby greatly prolong the suffering of thousands of men, women, and children throughout my State.

And why this unjust discrimination?

Recollect, these men are not only subjected to all the prohibitions contained in section 2 of this bill, but by section 3 you say they must not arbitrarily refuse to sell their product to any responsible person who applies to purchase same. That proposition has been ably discussed by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS].

I think he has made a fair and thorough explanation of that. I will not undertake to go into details of the coal and copper industries, because I really do not know much about the details of either. But there is one thing stated here that I do not believe to be true. I do not believe that section 3 applies to the local coal dealers and distributors to the ultimate consumers in the various States. It reads in this way:

That it shall be unlawful for the owner or operator of any mine or for any person controlling the product of any mine engaged in selling its product in commerce to refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to a responsible person, firm, or corporation who applies to purchase such product.

"For the owner or operator of any mine or for any person controlling the product of any mine." Therefore your law will not reach the coal dealer in the city or village unless that coal dealer happens to control the entire product of some mine. I do not think it is as far-reaching as some gentlemen here have suggested, and I think there is where gentlemen receive the impression that trust prices obtain in the coal trade. It is these local coal dealers in the large cities and towns who clique together and raise the price. [Applause.]

The copper content in the Michigan rock is usually only from 15 to 20 pounds to the ton, some of it running as high as 35 pounds. At the present prices the copper in a ton of rock yields from $2.25 to $5. This rock is drilled by compressed air and after it is blasted down it is hoisted thousands of feet to the surface of the earth by means of heavy cables and expensive machines.

Then it goes to the stamping mills and smelters, as I have just narrated, and all this involves a heavy expense. It can readily be seen that this rock is worked on a very narrow margin of profit, requiring hundreds of tons of rock to be taken daily out of the ordinary mine to pay the daily operating expenses. Many of these companies have been for years operating at a loss, but with the hope of striking a rock having a sufficient copper content to be worked at a profit.

It seems to me that the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of this bill will tend to discourage the operations of the exploration mines, and either drive out of business the mines now paying small dividends or compel their employees to take a very much less wage.

What is true of the copper industry is equally true of the bituminous-coal industry. If the small independent mine operator can barely exist and every few months witnesses some of them in bankruptcy at a time when they have the utmost freedom of contract, what will become of them when you impose the harassing and uncalled-for annoyances provided for in section 3 of this bill? Suppose you harness up in the same way the farmers, the manufacturers of the thousand and one things in this country, the lumbermen, and all those who are to some extent engaged in shipping commodities in interstate commerce, do any of you think you would be returned to Congress after such a law became effective?

With no mine owner or operator representing either metalliferous or coal mines heard before this committee, and it certainly would have been the part of wisdom to have had extensive hearings of both, and a committee absolutely ignorant of the conditions obtaining in metalliferous mining and the larger portion having no knowledge whatever of the coal-mine industry, we find them blindly imposing restrictions on the freedom of these persons to enter into contracts when they do not dare to impose like burdens on those engaged in industries which they do know something about.

Our Democratic friends go about enacting this sort of legislation just as if they were enacting a tariff law. I suppose it is force of habit and they can not help it. But I would think the results already being reaped by the Underwood tariff bill would cause them to at least want a little light as to the existing conditions of our metalliferous and coal mines before reporting the proposed legislation.

The copper mines of northern Michigan have natural ventilations and are not bothered with gas and dust to the extent of causing dangerous explosions.

These serious difficulties to some extent confront all bituminous coal miners, but some of them are confronted by greater difficulties of this character than others. The small, independent coal operator has also to compete with the large operator, frequently more favorably situated, with natural conditions respecting the mining of the coal in his favor, and advantaged by up-to-date electrical mining machinery, which would be too expensive an equipment for the small plant.

There are numerous lines of investigation in the production and marketing of coal that the committee could have pursued with great profit, and have given a vast amount of valuable information to this body in their report, and which would have enabled us to at least intelligently vote on this proposition.

But the various branches of the metalliferous mining industry should have been accorded a full hearing as well as the branches of the coal industry.

Sections 6 and 8 contain some objectionable provisions, ably pointed out by Mr. VOLSTEAD, of Minnesota, and it seems to me that he has clearly shown that the enactment of these sections as they now stand materially weakens the law it is so much desired to have strengthened.

There is a widespread desire throughout the country to have Congress adjourn, and I have no doubt but that this sentiment will be suddenly and greatly augmented if we pass this bill as it now stands.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this antitrust legislation and expect to give my support to the pending bill to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, and known as House bill 15657. I am inclined to believe that the bill as presented to the House by the Judiciary Committee, with an invitation for proper amendments, needs some amendment, at least in some sections. The law ought to be strong enough to cover every violation sought to be reached by this class of legislation.

The country is entitled to an efficient antitrust law to reach the evils complained of, and in addition thereto an intelligent and courageous court in every section of the land; not only a strong law, but an efficient court to sit in judgment upon the violations of the law. And besides the law and the court, in order to make the law effective, it must have honest, able, willing, and courageous officials desirous of and ambitious to enforce the law. The law and the courts may be without criticism, but there can be no enforcement of this law unless the violators thereof be brought to the bar of justice. The administration of the law is all important, and the people have often justly complained of the failure of its prosecuting officers to perform their full duty to the public and make effective the law of the land. But you may have the law and the courts and officers fully equipped, honest and anxious to discharge every duty, but it is important and necessary to bring the violator of the law within the process and jurisdiction of the court, and I want at this time to call attention especially to section 10 of the bill which provides—

That any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found—and especially to the last clause thereof.

It is possible that the committee has by its language, under the decisions of the courts, used words that are sufficient, but

I doubt it, and, in my judgment, this section ought to be amended. It provides that suit may be brought not only in the judicial district where the corporation is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found. It seems to me the last clause ought to be amended. If so, the committee having charge of the bill should prepare and present a proper amendment thereto. Take, for instance, a New Jersey corporation or a corporation of any other State. It is an inhabitant of the State where it is incorporated. Its principal business may be done beyond the borders of that State or district of which it is an inhabitant. Its wrongs and violations of law for which it should be held amenable may have been committed in districts other than the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. DICKINSON. Not now; let me finish, and I will be glad to answer any questions.

To repeat, a corporation may be an inhabitant of one State or district, but its principal business may be outside thereof, and its wrongs and violations of law, for which it should be held amenable, may have been committed in districts other than and far removed from the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant; and, in fact, it may do no business whatever in the State of its incorporation or the judicial district of which that State is a part. These great business concerns take out their incorporation papers and become inhabitants of the States desired or convenient to them because of more liberal laws to corporations and also because they do not desire to do business there, but elsewhere beyond its borders and possibly for the purpose of avoiding jurisdiction elsewhere.

But you say you give jurisdiction in any district where the corporation may be found. How are you going to find a corporation, for the purpose of jurisdiction, except by express words of statute law? I grant you may be able to find its officers, agents, or employees for the purpose of service of certain process, but is that a finding of the corporation so as to give jurisdiction as to the place of suit or trial? Jurisdiction is given by express statute. Why not at the end of the section, after the word "found," add other words, such as "doing business, or violating the provisions of this law, or wherever it may do business or where its agents, officers, or employees may be found," or other appropriate language. A dozen suggestions may be made in the way of amendment. Whenever the cause of action arises there should be jurisdiction provided for action and trial. I prefer that the committee in charge of the bill prepare and offer its own appropriate amendment. But the language ought to be extended sufficiently to reach every contingency, so that these concerns may be sued in that jurisdiction where they commit the wrong, where the acts complained of may be committed, where the officers, agents, or employees, acting for their master corporation, may be found setting aside the law, and where the witnesses are easily obtainable, and not leave the section so that those who have suffered damages at the hands of a corporation shall be compelled to bring suit in the remote State or district of which the corporation is an inhabitant by virtue of its incorporation therein, having selected that remote State for its home, while it goes forth in remote sections of the country, and where its greed for unlawful gain willfully disregards the rights of others and boldly sets aside the provisions of the law.

Immense fortunes are made by selfish interests in defiance of the law and because of the fact that they are beyond the law. Great combinations band together, and, conducting their business by unlawful means in restraint of trade, drive out all independent competition and then mercilessly rob the public.

Cruel monopoly has bid defiance to the law, the courts, and executive power. It has sought to restrain and to delay the enactment of appropriate and effective legislation. It has sought to control the courts by placing its own agents and attorneys in the seats of justice, so that its judgments and decrees be not unfriendly to them. It has sought to fill the executive places with minions of their own, so that the processes of the courts might be under their control. It has at times bid defiance to State and Federal authority and has played one against the other, in order that they may escape punishment for their ill deeds. They sometimes want the law to be weak and obscurely written and leave it for the courts to construe, so delay may come while they continue to pursue their own hard methods, and then would have friendly courts write decisions, wherever possible, along the lines of their own contention.

The time has come for action, for the enactment of law so clear and so plain that he who runs and reads may understand, a law so definite and certain that its meaning can not be misunderstood nor misconstrued. The conscience of the country is aroused; the demand for constructive law is imperative; no delay will satisfy the public, and the people speak to-day through a determined Executive, who asks for a great antitrust law, that will be sufficient and strong enough to reach every violation of law, and so written that speedy justice may be dealt out to those who would violate it.

There is an unrest in the country. The many have toiled too long for the benefit of the few. Special interests have controlled the industries of the country and fattened thereon; corporate power born in remote States have seized the wealth in other States, bid defiance to State authority, crushed down labor, produced conditions of war, destruction of life, while the helpless have cried out in vain for justice. The people are reaching out for their rights, and will have them and will take no excuse for delay. They want promises made, to be fulfilled where possible.

It is true we have revised the tariff and taxed large incomes. We have given the country a great currency law, election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, extended the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, provided for physical valuation of railroads, and passed many other wholesome laws desired by the people. But they want more; they want business unshackled and trust domination brought to an end; they want freedom of action in their struggle for better conditions; and they call upon Congress and the power of the Government to free them from the grasping and arrogant exercise of heretofore unrestrained power of greedy monopoly. I hope and believe that the Judiciary Committee will accept every reasonable amendment, that will strengthen the bill wherever needed, and that a real and effective antitrust law will be passed by Congress and become a law of the land.

Mr. WEBB. May I ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] if he has any further speakers for this afternoon.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; I have not.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HULL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, and other bills under the special order of the House, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. AUSTIN, for 2 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. PADGETT, for 10 days, on account of important business, and as a member of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the consideration of the Congress, the Thirtieth Annual Report of the United States Civil Service Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 23, 1914.

LETTERS THANKING MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FOR WEDDING GIFTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letters received by him:

CORNISH, N. H., May 9, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I was distressed that before we left Washington I did not have an opportunity to express to you and the Members of the House of Representatives my very deep appreciation of the beautiful wedding present and of the generous sentiments that prompted it. I have rarely seen a more wonderful and striking set of silver. It will always be associated not alone with the happiest event of my life but also with this intensely interesting period of our country's history in which you and your associates of the House are playing such a conspicuous part. Please convey to the Members of the House and the committee of which Mr. MANN was chairman my warmest thanks and deepest appreciation; and believe me,

Very sincerely, yours,

ELEANOR WILSON MCADOO.

SHOREHAM HOTEL,
H STREET NW. AT FIFTEENTH,
Washington, April 27, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. CLARK: Mr. FLOOD and myself appreciated so much the beautiful silver service which you and other Members of the House sent us as a bridal present.

We particularly appreciated the letter accompanying the gift.

I hope soon to have the pleasure of thanking you in person.

Sincerely,

ANNA P. FLOOD.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House joint resolution 168.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on House joint resolution 168. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House now adjourn until 11 o'clock on Monday, when we shall take up the pending legislation under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House adjourn until 11 o'clock next Monday, to take up the pending bill and to modify the rule to that extent.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, what is the object of trying to evade the mandate of the rule? Why not have a night session and get through with this business?

Mr. WEBB. One reason is that we have no one who is ready to speak to-night.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then read the bill. If you have nobody to talk, proceed with the measure.

Mr. WEBB. It is Saturday night, and the House has been working hard all the week.

Mr. DONOVAN. I am going to object, Mr. Speaker. Why do they not read the bill? They are all intelligent Members. They bring in a rule here and then, like children, come in a few hours afterwards and want to change it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Let me say to the gentleman from Connecticut that the only effect his objection will have will be to bring the House back to-night and then adjourn after five minutes, because the rule provides that the House shall not sit later than 11 o'clock. It can adjourn after a session of five minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Not unless some one makes a point of no quorum.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina if it is the intention of the committee to use all of the 16 hours allowed by the rule for general debate?

Mr. WEBB. It is the intention to, but I will say frankly that it will probably hasten the conclusion of the general debate if we adjourn now until Monday.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman say that it is likely to do so?

Mr. WEBB. I think it is. I doubt if all the time will be used on our side, and I think the gentleman from Minnesota says it will be so on his side.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the chairman give us some idea about what time will be used?

Mr. WEBB. On our side I do not think that we will require more than three hours on Monday.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think that we will occupy more than three hours on this side. Progress has been made more rapidly than we expected. There are some parties that want to speak on the bill yet.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, if the chairman of the committee will agree to cut down the time for general debate 5 hours—make it 11 hours—I will agree. There is so much demagogism and buncombe in the debate. Why, Mr. Speaker, you listen to the Republicans and you would think it was something dangerous to the country, and yet to-night here they are nearly all absent. That great man from California, who was so eloquent in his appeal to patriotism, and his associate Member, Mr. KAHN, gone for two or three days. Then there is that great barrister from Pennsylvania, who is said to have a greater reputation than any other lawyer on the hemisphere—it seems that the public business does not interest him. He had a few remarks to make and then hied himself back to Pennsylvania.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. I shall be delighted to.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask the gentleman if what he says is true about the discussion of the antitrust law, if it is not also true that every speech that has been made has been made upon the bill?

Mr. DONOVAN. I think so. Now, if the gentleman from North Carolina will agree to cut down the debate to 11 hours, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from North Carolina says that he will only want about three hours additional on Monday, and the gentleman from Minnesota says that he will, on that side, only want three hours. Can we not, by unanimous consent, limit the debate to 6 hours?

Mr. WEBB. At this stage of the debate I can not agree to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects, and the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] to preside to-night as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains for general debate?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid presiding over this deliberative body I withdraw my objection. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that instead of taking a recess until 8 o'clock the House now stand adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m. Monday next. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I simply want to make the observation, the Republican side having been pointed out as not being present, that there are only about 20 Members present on that side, and if that challenge comes again from that side there is going to be a quorum here to do any business.

Mr. BARTLETT. We can adjourn without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the House stands adjourned, by unanimous consent, until Monday next at 11 o'clock a. m.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House stood adjourned until Monday, May 25, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 25, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, from everlasting to everlasting Thou art God. A thousand years in Thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night. Thou dost not count the short span of our human existence as the measure of Thy purpose in human life.

We come to Thee this morning with sad hearts because another one of the sweet ties of human friendship has been broken. A man respected and loved among us has been called to the great beyond.

We thank Thee for those qualities of heart and mind that made him a high and patriotic statesman, a devoted friend, a lover of little children, honored by his State, respected by his fellow citizens, loved by those who knew him best.

The mystery of life is again presented to us. We ask, who is sufficient for these things? We turn our faces to Thee, O God of grace, and pray that Thou wilt still lead us on.

We commit to Thee with our sympathy and love that inner circle of friends of the dead Senator, whose hearts are too tender at this hour even for the touch of human sympathy, and pray that they may feel the healing touch of the great sympathizing divine friend. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE, UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, May 25, 1914.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate I appoint Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK, a Senator from the State of Nebraska, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

JAMES P. CLARKE,
President pro tempore.

Mr. HITCHCOCK thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer for the day and directed that the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR WILLIAM O. BRADLEY.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, it becomes my sad and painful duty to announce to the Senate the death of my distinguished colleague, Senator BRADLEY, who passed away at 9.45 o'clock last Saturday night in this city.

He came to this Chamber with the greatest honor that his native State could bestow upon him. He had the distinction of being the only member of his party who was ever honored with the governorship and the Senatorship of the great State of Kentucky.

He was one of the most genial of men and a prince among his fellows. He was a distinguished lawyer, a great orator, and a profound statesman. His followers in Kentucky idolized him, and they will love his memory as they loved him during his life. He will be greatly missed by his colleagues in this Chamber, as he will be mourned by his thousands of followers and friends in his beloved State. At some future time I shall ask the Senate to set apart a day to pay tribute to his memory and to his distinguished services to his State and to his country.

I send to the Secretary's desk the following resolutions and ask that they be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

The Assistant Secretary (Henry M. Rose) read the resolutions (S. Res. 374), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM O. BRADLEY, late a Senator from the State of Kentucky.

Resolved, That a committee of 14 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for arranging the funeral of Mr. BRADLEY.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect his remains be removed from his late home in this city to Frankfort, Ky., for burial in charge of the Sergeant at Arms, attended by the committee, who shall have power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair appoints as members of the committee provided for in the second resolution the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. JAMES; the senior Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. GALLINGER; the junior Senator from Wyoming, Mr. WARREN; the junior Senator from North Carolina, Mr. OVERMAN; the senior Senator from Utah, Mr. SMOOT; the senior Senator from Indiana, Mr. SHIVELY; the senior Senator from New York, Mr. ROOT; the junior Senator from Indiana, Mr. KERN; the senior Senator from New Jersey, Mr. MARTINE; the junior Senator from Washington, Mr. POINDEXTER; the junior Senator from New York, Mr. O'GORMAN; the senior Senator from New Mexico, Mr. FALL; the junior Senator from Arizona, Mr. SMITH; and the junior Senator from New Jersey, Mr. HUGHES.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I move as a further mark of respect to the memory of the distinguished Senator that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock and 7 minutes a. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 26, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 25, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of the universe, Father of all souls, dispenser of all good, strengthen our faith, encourage our hopes, and bring us closer to Thee, that with clear minds, warm hearts, and ready hands we may push forward in every good work and departing leave the world a little better that we have lived and wrought. Freely we have received, freely may we give.

Admonished, by the death of one of the congressional household, of the brief tenor of life, to work while it is yet day, for the night cometh when no man can work; comfort, we beseech Thee, the colleagues, friends, and bereaved family by the blessed hope of the life immortal and prepare us all for the change inevitable, that we may be ready when the summons comes to go forward to whatever awaits us in the dispensation of Thy providence. In the spirit of Him who said, "I am the resurrection and the life." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, May 23, 1914, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, until June 5, on account of important business.

To Mr. HULL, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCKELLAR, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DIES, for two weeks, on account of sickness.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following letter from Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 23, 1914.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, United States.

MR. SPEAKER: I have this day tendered to the governor of Alabama my resignation as a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the third congressional district of Alabama, to take effect on Monday, May 25, 1914.

Respectfully, HENRY D. CLAYTON.

The SPEAKER. Of course no action has to be taken on that.

NOMINATION AND ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill S. 2860, and before the request is submitted I would like to say that I feel quite sure it will not consume two minutes of time to dispose of this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 709).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill S. 2860, an act providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, and 4, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 3.

W. W. RUCKER,
R. F. BROUSSARD,
W. D. B. AINEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

STATEMENT OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

The Senate receded from its disagreement to the House amendments numbered 1, 2, and 4, and the House receded from its amendment numbered 3.

W. W. RUCKER.
R. F. BROUSSARD.
W. D. B. AINEY.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of the conference report? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the statement does not indicate what the different amendments are. Will the gentleman briefly state at least what amendment No. 3 is?

Mr. RUCKER. Amendment No. 1 was one in which the House inserted the language "not heretofore made." Amendment No. 2 was the amendment in which the House struck out the words "the case of," a mere change of language. In amendment No. 3 the House struck out the words "in accordance with the laws of such State respecting the ordinary executive and administrative officers thereof who are elected by the vote of the people of the entire State," and substituted for those words "the same as that provided for the nomination and election of governor of such State."

The House recedes from that amendment for the reason that the Senators with whom we have talked quite fully state that that particular language involved in the Senate bill had been carefully considered in committee and also in the Senate, and they preferred that language. Amendment No. 4 is a new section added by the House, fixing the three-year limitation in this law. The Senate agrees to all the amendments except the one I speak of.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the conference report be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

PRINTING AND BINDING (COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS NO. 2).

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 525.

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections No. 2 be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15657, and other bills. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], who has been acting as Chairman, has been called unexpectedly to Tennessee, and the Chair appoints his colleague, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, to preside.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15657, the antitrust bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART], a member of the committee.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to make an extended speech on this bill. The bill has been under consideration for a long time and has been very ably and exhaustively presented to the committee. What I may say might not add to the light that has been thrown upon it, but I will occupy the time allotted to me in presenting at least some of the features of the bill.

I was deeply impressed by a speech made on this bill before the committee on Saturday by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON], a member of the committee, and especially with what he said as to the growth of socialism and the reasons why socialism grows. It seems to me that the gentleman is deeply impressed with the fact, or, rather, with the fear, if American business becomes consolidated into the hands of great and nation-wide business concerns, able to cater to the entire market in any line, that the greater the consolidation the easier it would be to take over those lines of business by the Government should socialism finally prevail.

If each line of business is accumulated into one concern, there will be less resistance to the confiscation of it. If property is finally to be absorbed by the Government, it would add greatly to the convenience of those who hold that socialism is the solution of American industrial questions to have all business monopolized as much as possible before it is taken over.

There is a note of warning—of solemn warning—in what was said by the gentleman from Wisconsin. He has criticized this trust bill and has said that it will not prevent a further consolidation and monopoly of business, and therefore that it still remains as an encouragement to socialism. Strange as it may seem coming from a member of the Republican Party, and a distinguished and able one, the gentleman from Wisconsin has the sentiment of him who cried, "Lay on, Macduff!" He has criticized us for not being more drastic in our provisions for curbing big business in the United States. What has a party come to when one major general is shouting "Halt!" and the other major general is ordering us all to charge the breastworks?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAGGART. I will.

Mr. MANN. Is not that the situation on the Democratic side on this bill in reference to a number of things in it?

Mr. TAGGART. Well, now, I have not observed that there was any such disagreement as that on the Democratic side in reference to this bill.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will be here under the five-minute rule, he will observe that.

Mr. TAGGART. I observe that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is borrowing trouble.

Mr. MANN. Why, we were informed, if the gentleman will permit, by the gentleman who now holds the House in the hollow of his hand so far as business is concerned, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, that he proposes to strike out one of the most important provisions in this bill and insert something else in it.

Mr. TAGGART. I beg leave to say that the mysterious gentleman referred to by the gentleman from Illinois did not make such a statement as that or anything quite having that meaning, but he did say that a provision in section 7 of this bill would be submitted to this House for amendment under the five-minute rule, and that everybody in this House would have the free and full privilege of voting on it as he chooses.

Mr. MANN. Oh, he stated in a colloquy with me that they proposed to amend the bill and change it in that respect, and that they had the votes to do it.

Mr. TAGGART. Well, this is the House of Representatives, and the time has come when the House of Representatives is sufficiently reformed so that it will work out its will if it has the votes to do a certain thing. There was a day here when it had the votes to do things and was not permitted to do things.

Mr. MANN. That is the case now as to prohibition and woman suffrage.

Mr. TAGGART. Do you wish to express your enthusiasm for both of those great measures at this time? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I am willing to vote upon them if you will give us the chance.

Mr. TAGGART. The gentleman from Illinois will have a golden opportunity when the time comes. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I am afraid not.

Mr. TAGGART. Yes. There is something strange when there is a marshal commanding "Forward!" like Blucher on one side of the House, and on the same side of the House a Fabius who is willing to continue his retreat. You remember the lines that were written by Macaulay about the sack of Rome, where—

"Heaven help him!" quoth Lars Porsen, "and bring him safe to shore,
For such a gallant feat of arms was never seen before."

And there was a difference of opinion on a ground very much like that existing among you gentlemen now, for another shouted—

"Curse on him!" quoth false Sextus, "and let the villain drown;
But for this stay ere close of day we would have sacked the town."

This represents the difference here, at least on one side of the House, and if there is any difference on our side of the House that difference is represented by those who are willing to open this bill to the entire House, free from caucus action, free from all restraint, and call upon every Member of the House to vote upon every section of it as he sees fit——

Mr. GARNER. A thing you never had before under a Republican administration.

Mr. TAGGART. Yes; and I wish to say right here that in all the trust bills introduced in the whole history of this House such a privilege as that was never granted to the House of Representatives before.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. TAGGART. I will.

Mr. FESS. I wondered why it was necessary to have a caucus action on the currency question and on the tariff question, and not have it upon this question. Is there anything in this question that is less important than the other two?

Mr. TAGGART. I do not know that there is anything less important in this than in the other two, but there is less of a variety of opinion upon this than there was on the other two.

Mr. FESS. That means that caucus action is not to be held where there is not a variety of opinion?

Mr. TAGGART. The caucus action should be had in the discussion of those bills where the party is practically unanimous except as to details. With respect to those measures that are not party measures, like this one is not, but which is a national measure, part of it indorsed by practically the entire House of Representatives, there is no necessity for a caucus. There is a measure in this bill that had but 18 votes against it in a former Congress. There is another measure in this bill that had but 31 votes against it in a former House, and, in fact, the entire House of Representatives was practically unanimous with regard to the most important provisions of the bill in the Sixty-second Congress, and I dare say is practically unanimous now.

Why should any man's notions as to what should be placed in this bill, as if it were a commercial proposition like the tariff, be tied up by caucus action? The tariff is a commercial proposition—a proposition very much like bargaining over the counter of a store as to whether you will pay 35 cents or 40 cents for an article. Men would never agree about the tariff unless they first got together and discussed the matter fully.

In these matters that are rooted in the liberty of the American citizen I want to say that the Democratic Party is practically unanimous, and if there is anything that distinguishes a Democrat from his brother it is because he wants to extend more liberty to the American citizen.

Mr. FESS. Then, you indorse the caucus action on certain kinds of bills and oppose it on other kinds of bills? Is that it?

Mr. TAGGART. I think caucus action is wise on certain kinds of bills, and I think that caucus action is unnecessary on other bills. It is not deciding between wisdom and unwisdom, but between what is necessary and what is unnecessary.

Mr. FESS. And the lack of diversity on this bill is the reason why you did not have caucus action on it?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know who has the floor. Who has the 15 minutes? [Laughter.]

Mr. TAGGART. I am yielding to the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. FESS. For the information of the gentleman from Connecticut. My point was—because the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART] seems absolutely fair—why is it necessary to have caucus action on certain great measures and not on others? Is caucus action a necessary evil?

Mr. TAGGART. Now, the gentleman seems to throw the word "evil" in there gratuitously. It seems as though the gentleman regards a caucus as an evil, and is asking me what measure of evil there might be in caucus action on anything. Does the gentleman regard caucus action as an evil? If he does, I wish to say that the history of the gentleman's party is a compendium of the record of evil. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FESS. I hope the gentleman will understand——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. TAGGART. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That I am not holding a brief for any political party, past or present. I am trying to get light on this measure.

Mr. TAGGART. I am glad to say that no one rejoices in your conversion more than I. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. TAGGART. I would like to have 15 minutes more time.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 15 minutes more.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, this Government was founded to promote the liberty of the individual. The Constitution was drafted for the individual, not in his organized capacity but in his individual capacity. The great American ideal is the free, untrammeled citizen, at perfect liberty under law to work out his own destiny and to succeed in that line of endeavor for which nature has fitted him best. The fathers who drafted the Constitution and who founded this Government lived on the verge and seashore of what Daniel Webster called "a fresh, untouched, unbounded, magnificent wilderness," practically unexplored, and uninhabited except by settlers in their little log houses, who tilled their farms and who lived in peace and comfort. There was then not a great manufacturer in the New World; perhaps there was not a manufacturing institution or a business house in which as many as a hundred persons were employed.

The Constitution, therefore, was not drafted as a law merchant, or primarily with the view of having business regulated. All the power that we have, and to which we are trying to give expression in this bill and other similar measures, is contained in 17 words in the Constitution:

The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce * * * among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

No other line or word in the Constitution adds to the power of Congress in dealing with the greatest concern of the American people at this hour, the greatest commercial people the world has ever known. But that Constitution had in it a bill of rights, a guaranty to every citizen of the same rights as every other citizen under the flag.

When this country grew to be the greatest of all commercial nations, and with the means of communication perfected, business began to fall into the hands of powerful combinations, and they, in the exercise of their power, denied and crushed out the rights of other citizens to do business in this country. Where a citizen started in to compete with them in the same line they spent their resources and sold goods at a loss, for the purpose of underselling him and compelling him to leave the business that was dear to his heart and in which he proposed to engage as a vocation during his whole life. The individual liberty to go where he pleased, to be a free man, to worship as he pleased, and all those other personal things that were mentioned in the Constitution remained to him; but he did not have what the nature of things gave him when the Constitution was adopted. He did not have the privilege and the right of working out his own destiny under his own flag as he thought he had the right to do.

The States were first to take these matters under consideration. I have the happiness here to say to-day that the State of Kansas was the first State in the Union to pass, in 1905, an act forbidding discrimination in price in different communities and localities within the confines of that great State, having 81,000 square miles. This was brought about through the operations of a great coal-oil company which had undertaken to monopolize the entire market for its product in that State, and which sent out its agents to follow up and waylay its rivals in business and destroy their business by underselling them and by selling its product at less than its product was worth. As a part of my remarks I will insert that portion of the Kansas statute which puts a penalty on discrimination in price in different localities in the State:

ACT OF 1905.

1. Any person, firm, or corporation, foreign or domestic, doing business in the State of Kansas and engaged in the production, manufacture, or distribution of any commodity in general use, that shall intentionally, for the purpose of destroying competition, discriminate between different sections, communities, or cities of this State by selling such commodity at a lower rate in one section, community, or city, or any portion thereof, than is charged for such commodity in another section, community, or city, after equalizing the distance from the point of production, manufacture, or distribution and freight rates therefrom, shall be deemed guilty of unfair discrimination. (L. 1905, ch. 2, sec. 1; G. S., sec. 5162.)

This statute has been followed substantially in as many as 18 States of the Union. Uniformity of price is required throughout the State, the cost of transportation being equalized and taken into consideration.

There was no statute of the United States dealing with this subject, and in section 2 of this bill we have provided what has been enacted in so many States of the Union. As a part of my remarks I insert the section:

SEC. 2. That any person engaged in commerce who shall either directly or indirectly discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities in the same or different sections or communities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, with the purpose or intent to thereby destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor, of either such purchaser or seller, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of transportation: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act.

Criticism was made here the other day by gentlemen who called attention to the proviso in the second section—

That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of transportation.

Did any gentleman expect that we would make a statute that would require a uniform price regardless of the grade or quality of the thing sold? Even if it was within the power of Congress to enact a statute of that kind the statute would be worthless. It would be denying the fact that things have different values, and no legislative body can fix real value of any article or the relative value of different articles. The way to look at it is to consider what would be the case if we provided otherwise.

The criticism was made that inasmuch as quantity is mentioned here this bill will give liberty to sell large quantities at a lower relative price than small quantities, which will render the bill meaningless and incapable of enforcement. Suppose we enacted that a can of corn shall be sold at the same relative price as a carload of canned corn. Would you vote for a provision of that kind? If you did, you would then indeed destroy the meaning of the bill and render it absurd. The meaning of the bill is that if in one place in this country they sell a carload of any given commodity at a lower and discriminating price than they sell a carload of the same commodity at another place in this country, the cost of transportation being equalized and considered, then they are guilty under this law. That is the meaning of it.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TAGGART. I will.

Mr. FESS. Suppose a small producer of canned corn, such as would be in my part of the State, wanted to open a market in Washington or in some city where he had no market. Would he be allowed to sell at a less price on the initiation of the contract, in order to get an opening, than in any other part of the United States where the cost of transportation would be the same?

Mr. TAGGART. There would be no exception made in a case of that kind. If he was making a superior article of canned corn, which of course they do in your district——

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. TAGGART. The corn would have to speak for itself. He would not be allowed to give it away for the purpose of taking the market away from somebody else.

Mr. FESS. Now, will not that be an advantage to the great producer, who has his agents everywhere, as against the small producer of the same article?

Mr. TAGGART. Why should it be?

Mr. FESS. Because he has advertising methods by which he can get his article before the community in a way in which my man can not.

Mr. TAGGART. The large producer has that advantage now, has he not? He has the same advertising methods now; and he not only has that advantage, but suppose there was some great canning company practically catering to the entire trade of the United States. If your friend in Ohio should undertake to initiate his trade in any community, he would perhaps find that he was followed up by an agent of this great company, who would give away canned corn until your man was forced out of business, and under the present law he could do it. If he had not established an agency in that State he could do it, under the present interstate-commerce laws of this country, even in a State where they require uniformity of price.

Mr. FESS. My point is this: Is there not a possibility under this section to favor the great producer as against the small producer, the thing you are trying to prevent?

Mr. TAGGART. I grasp just what the gentleman means, and it is this: That a small producer, who has some money and a great deal of enthusiasm, desires to go into the markets of the United States and by offering his wares at a cheap price introduce his product in certain neighborhoods.

Mr. FESS. Yes; that is the idea.

Mr. TAGGART. And give the people notice that after 60 or 90 days he will charge a higher price, but for the purpose of introducing it he will first sell it at cost or below cost. That has been a practice in the United States that has been engaged in ever since the interstate commerce began. What right has he to do that? [Applause.]

It would seem as though a well-meaning person or firm, desiring to introduce a new and superior article, ought to be encouraged. Possibly a reasonable time for advertising an article, by selling it at a low price, ought to be provided in the bill. When the bill is submitted to the Committee of the Whole House a full opportunity will be given to amend this section.

Section 4 of the bill will afford relief to retail dealers, who are now required by wholesalers to handle certain articles exclusively and become sole agents for certain goods. These retailers have complained that they are injured by conditions imposed upon them by wholesale firms, and that their trade is limited and embarrassed. While the contracts that they are obliged to make to sell certain articles exclusively and refuse to sell competing articles of the same kind may be wholly void, the people engaged in big business, who sell to these retail dealers, are able to enforce these contracts by refusing to supply the retail dealer any more of the same kind of goods if he should carry in his stock certain competing articles. This section does not prohibit sole agencies, as those who have not read it carefully have said that it does. A manufacturer of any article can employ a sole agent to sell that article wherever he pleases. A sole agent simply represents his principal. What it will prevent is compelling an independent dealer to become a sole agent for any article, by oppressing him commercially, if he chooses to buy and sell what he pleases. Abundant evidence was brought before the committee that great firms that lease machinery and supplies, and by the terms of the lease seek to compel, and do compel, the people who lease the supplies and machinery to patronize these firms exclusively. The manufacturer who is in the grip of this class of people has no liberty at all. This kind of oppression will be effectually prohibited by this bill.

Section 6 arms the Department of Justice and the courts of the United States with a new and formidable weapon to prevent and punish the crimes of destructive business. Under the provisions of this section when a suit is brought against a party by the United States and a final judgment is rendered against the defendant, showing that the defendant has violated the Sherman antitrust law, or any antitrust law, the record of that judgment can be put in evidence in a suit against the same defendant for damages that may be brought by any private individual, and the judgment so introduced will be considered conclusive evidence that the defendant had violated the antitrust laws, and the only question for the jury to decide will be the amount of damages that the plaintiff ought to recover.

A great many suits have been brought against trusts by the United States and many trusts have been dissolved. Some few have been punished, but the people whose business they destroyed have been practically without a remedy. When this bill becomes a law, the person who willfully destroys another person's business will do so at his peril. Damages can be recovered and the claim for damages will not be outlawed by the statute of limitations during the time that the United States is proceeding against the offending party. The Government can subpœna witnesses from any place in the Union and require their personal presence. Not alone will an offending corporation be punished, but any director, officer, or agent, who shall have authorized or shall have done any of the prohibited acts shall be held to be guilty.

The bill is framed for the purpose of liberating business and not for the purpose of injuring or destroying any business. Its great purpose is to protect small business from big business, and to compel all business to be conducted honestly.

In the Sixty-second Congress two bills relating to labor were passed in the House—the anti-injunction bill and the contempt bill. Although they were vigorously opposed by some of the Republican minority on the committee, there were but 31 votes against the anti-injunction bill and only 18 votes against the bill that provided for trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt. Both of these bills are included word for word in this bill, comprising sections 15 to 23, inclusive. Now, I do not propose to talk about the rights of labor. This would be, to my mind, a narrow view of the subject. We are not legislating for citizens simply because they belong to any organization or because they describe themselves or they may be described by any distinctive term or combination of words. I do not wish to appeal to men of a certain class or to convey the impression to them that I am pretending to represent them exclusively. This never was, and never ought to be, and I hope never will be, the position taken by any representative of the American people. We who are here represent them all. The whole people have particular respect for all classes of men who work earnestly and faithfully to bear the burden of modern civilization and the tremendous labor that is the glory of American life. In these nine sections are contained a charter of liberty and a bill of rights for the whole American people. The people of this country are not satisfied to have their sense of justice expressed wholly through the decisions and the decrees of a group of judges with a life tenure of office. While many of these men are of the highest character and interpret the law fearlessly as it has been provided for them, there are those among them who have made a different use of their tremendous power and who have earned the reputation of being the wisely selected and faithful guardians of big business. These provisions will come as a relief to the conscience of every wise and thoughtful Federal judge in the whole land. These sections will establish and make plain the simple rights that men have enjoyed for ages. The following are the rights that shall not be disturbed by the process of any Federal court when this bill becomes a law:

First. No injunction shall run against persons because they have ceased to perform any kind of work or labor.

Second. Courts are prohibited from issuing injunctions to prevent persons from recommending, advising, or persuading others to cease the work that they are doing.

Third. The right peaceably to assemble, guaranteed by the Constitution, must not be interfered with by any injunction to prevent persons from assembling peacefuly at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes, although the meeting may be had at or near a house or place where any person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be if the purpose of the meeting is peaceful and merely for the purpose of obtaining or communicating information or persuading any person in a peaceful manner, either to work or abstain from work.

Fourth. People will not, under this bill, be enjoined from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to a dispute or controversy between employer and employee, or from giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such a controversy, any money or thing of value that they see fit to give.

Fifth. A controversy between employer and employee is shorn of its distinctive character by this bill. It has been treated in a class by itself in certain Federal courts. Courts have issued process in a controversy when the same courts would hold that it would be unlawful to issue such process in a case which was not a controversy between employer and employee. In other words, the acts of men in the case of a dispute, although they may be peaceful, have been considered in a different light than their ordinary acts. Under the provisions of this bill no one shall be enjoined from doing any act or thing in the case of a dispute or while a controversy is pending which would be a lawful act if there were no controversy.

Sixth. The right of trial by jury for the offense called contempt of court, which is not committed in the presence of the court, is fully and effectually provided for in this bill. It is strange but true that courts and lawmakers have sharply distinguished between violations of positive law and violations of the orders and decrees of courts. In the case of one charged with a violation of the criminal law, especially a felony, a trial by jury has been the undisputed birthright of the English-speaking people of the world for more than a thousand years. But during all those centuries in the case of violating the order of the court, the offending person has been fined or imprisoned at the will and by the verdict of one man sitting on a bench. What reason has there been for this distinction? If there ever was any reason, the representatives of the American people are now ready and willing to declare, and do declare that that reason has ceased to exist.

This bill does not license destruction or interfere with the power of courts to prevent injury to persons or property. It simply provides that courts shall not unreasonably nor arbitrarily exercise that power. We are not so conservative as the English are, and yet a short time ago the British Parliament passed an act covering a phase of labor disputes that has been considered unlawful heretofore and has been the subject of particular attention in United States courts. The new British law is as follows:

> It shall be lawful for one or more persons, acting on their own behalf or in behalf of a trades-union, in contemplation of a trade dispute, to attend peacefully and in a reasonable manner at or near a house or place where a person works or carries on business, if he attend for the purpose of persuading any person to work or to abstain from working.

The bill we have prepared is a measure for the whole people. Under its provision no business will fail, except in so far as it is seeking by unfair and unlawful means to destroy a competing business. Honesty is encouraged and protected; dishonesty restrained and punished. Property and business are not abandoned to the mob and the rights of the citizen are not left solely in the hands of the autocrat of the bench. The Committee on the Judiciary, after a full and fair hearing of every person who chose to be present, took the middle course between these extremes, and with whatever measure of ability they had, prepared this bill, for the consideration of Congress and on behalf of all the people. Should its provisions fall short of justice they can be amended. Should they work injustice, they can soon be remedied, but ever and always let us keep before us that the humblest individual beneath the flag has an equal right to work out his destiny under the law in the way he chooses, and that the work of his life must be protected from those who from selfish motives would do him injury.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2256. An act for the relief of James M. Campbell.

The mesage also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM O. BRADLEY, late a Senator from the State of Kentucky.

Resolved, That a committee of 14 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for arranging the funeral of Mr. BRADLEY.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect his remains be removed from his late home in this city to Frankfort, Ky., for burial, in charge of the Sergeant at Arms, attended by the committee, who shall have power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator the Senate do now adjourn.

That in compliance with the foregoing the Presiding Officer had appointed as said committee, Mr. JAMES, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. WARREN, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. ROOT, Mr. KERN, Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. O'GORMAN, Mr. FALL, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, and Mr. HUGHES.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] 20 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I trust that anything I may say in discussing this bill will not be treated as invidious criticism of the members of the committee who reported it. I have the highest opinion for the learning, the zeal, and the industry of these gentlemen. I have made a considerable study of this question, and my study has only forced upon me the sense of the enormous difficulties which confronted them when they prepared the bill. With all this, I will have to say that I have been considerably disappointed in the bill and the report which accompanied it. But perhaps I ought not to have been, when there was added not only to the natural difficulties with which the gentlemen were confronted the pressure of political necessity which required them to bring in a bill which would meet some partisan exigency, and in accordance with the direction of a particular person, I ought not to be surprised that the committee has failed, as I think they have, to bring in a proper bill.

The gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, and particularly the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART] who has just taken his seat, have entirely misunderstood the trend of the criticisms upon this side. We do not object to this bill because it is too drastic; we object to the bill because it adds nothing to the law which precedes it and simply confuses and confounds men who are undertaking to do business under it. I am speaking now solely of the new provisions in the bill and not of the provisions which were already law by virtue of court decisions or statutes already enacted.

I object to this bill at this time, not because it adds too much power to the present law but because it detracts from and emasculates the Sherman law which is already on the statute books; not because it gives additional force and efficiency to the law we now have, but because it takes away in important respects the powers given to the Government in the law now on the statute books.

I object to it, further, because they have undertaken to add to a law which was clear and precise in its form provisions which are in some respects of doubtful constitutionality, and in one respect absolutely unconstitutional. They have done this by bringing in what I call a political bill, because Members on this side have not been asked to assist in its preparation. In this respect they have done very differently from the framers of the original Sherman law. I suppose everyone is aware that the original Sherman law was not prepared by Senator Sherman.

Mr. BARTLETT. Only the title.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Only the title, as the gentleman from Georgia states. After Senator Sherman had prepared and introduced a bill in the Senate, a substitute was prepared by Senator Reagan, of Texas, which undertook, in something the same form as the bill now before us, to define specifically the offenses which might come under its provisions. After that bill had been considered the committee finally brought out a substitute for the Reagan bill. It is sometimes supposed that the bill known as the Sherman law was in fact prepared by Senator Edmunds; but the real fact, as now known, is that it was prepared by Senator Hoar. I never had an opportunity of listening to Senator Hoar, but those who have heard him speak and those who study his writings know that he possessed in a remarkable degree a faculty of clear, accurate, and comprehensive expression such as was probably possessed by no other man in public life of his day, and it is doubtful if his powers in this respect have ever been equaled in our legislative history.

The Sherman law is a model of clearness and of brevity and a marvel in comprehension. Somebody has said that it was like a universal joint in machinery—it can be pointed in any direction and will work in any manner the party using it sees fit. The trouble we have had with the growth and development of trusts under the Sherman law is not from any defect in the law itself, but from failure of its administration, which has arisen partly through an unwillingness to enforce the law from dread of the special interests, and partly because of defects in the administrative powers of the courts.

I have been surprised, upon consideration of the bill now before us and of the report of the committee, that neither here nor in the report accompanying the bill does anyone set forth how the Sherman law has failed to reach the evils which are claimed to exist under the present law. There are no citations to any cases; there are no particular facts pointed out as to which it is claimed that the Sherman law can not and does not reach any wrong which is alleged to prevail.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has there been any case brought under the Sherman law, except one, where the present law as applied to the corporations, where the corporations have been convicted of violating the Sherman law, where the court has not upheld the law, except the Knight case, which failed for want of jurisdiction?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would say that the Knight case failed because it was not properly presented to the court.

Mr. BARTLETT. But it went off on a question of jurisdiction.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is entirely correct. I wish to consider more particularly the provisions of this bill now before the House, and as I am now discussing it in an informal manner I will welcome any questions or interruptions.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I think for the matter of the RECORD, to show that this was nonpartisan, the gentleman ought to state that it was unanimously adopted in the Senate and, I think, only one vote recorded against it in the House.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is referring to the Sherman law?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I had intended to mention that fact. It was discussed and adopted entirely in a nonpartisan way, and the vote upon it was almost unanimous, lacking only one vote, as the gentleman from Ohio has correctly stated.

I shall not have time to refer to all of the provisions of this bill to which I object, but I will call attention, first, to section 2, which provides, among other things, that any person engaged in commerce who shall discriminate in price between the purchasers of commodities with the intent and purpose thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor, the purchaser and the seller shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. I would like to inquire what case there is that has ever held that actions of that kind are not punishable under the Sherman law as it now stands? An act such as is described in this section is clearly an attempt to monopolize business.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. That species of monopoly and combination and trust, an effort to break down a competitor, is one of the earmarks of monopoly and violates the law and was pointed out in the celebrated Tobacco case as being evidence of violation of the law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has expressed very forcibly a matter to which I intended to refer, and very correctly.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield with pleasure to the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I am not able to point out to the gentleman where that has ever been held not to be a violation of the law, but it has never been held to be a violation of the Sherman law, and, in my opinion, such act of discrimination is not within the purview of the Sherman law as it now exists. The gentleman can not cite a case in which it has been so held. It is an instrumentality which has been used by different corporations, referred to by the courts as evidence tending to show that the corporation has been guilty of a violation of the Sherman law; but the single transaction, the act of discrimination, taken alone, condemned in that section, has never been held by a court in any decision to be a violation of the Sherman law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is quite correct as to the decisions, but at the same time it has been repeatedly held by the courts that such a transaction is one of the indicia and evidences of violations of the Sherman law. Section 2 of the Sherman law expressly states that every person who shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize or combine or conspire to monopolize any trade or commerce, and so forth, shall be subject to its provisions. If the gentleman means to say that these acts which he has described in section 2 of the bill are not done with intent to monopolize, and that he intends to make criminal acts which do not interfere with competition or tend to monopolize, then I will agree with him; but, otherwise, I am compelled to disagree.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that the object of that section is to strike down the practice that has been referred to by the courts in decisions in antitrust cases as one of the instrumentalities used in buiidlng up monopolies in this country, and I want to state further——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will pardon me, but my time is slipping by, and I am not going to be able to reach some matters I want to speak of particularly.

After the provision making these matters subject to penalty it was found necessary to add a number of provisos. These exceptions necessarily afford an opportunity to evade the Sherman law, which reached everything covered by this section, in so far as it interfered with competition, without any provisos. The law as it stands is sufficient, and section 2 of the bill will merely weaken it through these provisos.

I wish also to speak of section 3, which provides in part as follows:

> That it shall be unlawful for the owner or operator of any mine or for any person controlling the product of any mine engaged in selling its product in commerce to refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to a responsible person, firm, or corporation who applies to purchase such product for use—

And so forth.

As has been observed, this applies simply to the owners of coal and other mines. It does not apply to persons who are operating in other natural products, such as lumber, timber, and articles of that kind. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution provides that no State shall deprive any citizen of the equal protection of the law. Of course, this amendment applies only to the States, but it has never been held or contended, so far as I know, that the Constitution gives the Federal Government the right to deprive any citizen of the equal protection of its law. Of course, classifications can be made under the criminal law, where such classifications are not made arbitrarily; but what reason is given for selecting the coal miners or coal dealers under this provision? Why should not those who deal in lumber, those who own the forests, as well as those who control the mines, be subject to similar provisions, and what authority can gentlemen cite, giving Congress power to arbitrarily select certain individuals without any reason therefor and make them subject to penalty?

Mr. METZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. METZ. While we are trying to get at monopoly here, and have in mind oil and coal, and so forth, does not section 2 practically put every business house, every dealer in any kind of goods, in the same category with those big corporations, with this exception, that he can choose his own customers?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, no.

Mr. METZ. Oh, yes. It fixes the price.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think I did not fully understand the remarks of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does it not discriminate against the small producer rather than to put him on an equality with the large producer, who can send his men to represent his goods everywhere, while the small man can not, and therefore how is he going to get into the markets?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman has correctly stated an objection to the bill, and if the gentleman from New York [Mr. METZ] is correct, it would be an additional reason why this provision is of doubtful constitutionality.

Mr. METZ. I agree with the gentleman. I think it is of doubtful constitutionality.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I see my time is passing rapidly, and I can only briefly refer to section 4. The distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] spoke of some decision which made necessary the enactment of this provision, but did not have the decision with him at the time he spoke, and I have not been able to find it since. In so far as acts covered by section 4——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, the gentleman will find the decision in volume 125, Federal Reporter, page 454. It is the case of Whitwell against the Continental Tobacco Co. et al.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. What kind of a case was it?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It was a case brought under the antitrust law, in which the court holds that kind of a contract is not in violation of the Sherman Act.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, I do not have time to discuss this matter fully, but if the framers of the bill wished to prevent the holders of a patent from putting restrictions upon the sale or lease of the patented article, we ought to have a separate and distinct bill for that purpose. Reference is made to a decision of a lower Federal court. If the decisions of the lower Federal courts stood, there would not be much left of the Sherman law.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman permit me right there?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I desire to ask the gentleman whether or not he thinks section 4 applies to patented articles at all. It says persons engaged in commerce. It does not make any difference, it does not say it should be a patented article that he is handling, but simply says it shall be a matter of commerce.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman calls attention to one of the vital defects of this provision. I am not prepared to say, and I doubt whether any gentleman is prepared to say definitely it would apply to such a case as the gentleman mentions. I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The gentleman refers to the decision cited by me as one rendered by a lower court? The decision rendered was in the United States circuit court of appeals by Judge Sanborn, in the case of Whitwell against the Continental Tobacco Co. et al., and can be found in volume 125, Federal Reporter, page 454.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman certainly is aware that that is not the highest Federal court.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It is a Federal court of very high authority, the highest next to the Supreme Court.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, before taking my seat I desire to refer to the provisions of section 6. There can be, as I said, no possible question but what the provisions of this section are unconstitutional. It provides that when a decree has been rendered in a suit commenced on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws that—> said judgment or decree shall, to the full extent to which such judgment or decree would constitute in any other proceeding an estoppel as between the United States and such defendant, constitute in favor of or against such defendant conclusive evidence of the same facts, and be conclusive as to the same questions of law in favor of or against any other party in any action or proceeding brought under or involving the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

The effect of this decision is such that if some third party should commence a suit for damages under the Sherman law he might find himself bound by a decree in an action brought by the United States against the same party, which holds that the Sherman law has not been violated. In such event, the party who wishes to commence his suit will find that he is estopped and precluded without having his day in court, without having any opportunity to be heard, without having any opportunity to present his evidence. The gentleman from Georgia has referred to the Knight case, in which the Sherman law was invoked, but where the case was dismissed with the findings of fact and conclusions of law that the Sherman law had not been violated. If the provisions of section 6 had then been in force and effect the parties who afterwards successfully maintained a suit for damages against the Sugar Trust would have in all probability found the decree in the Knight case standing like a stone wall in their way. I have no hesitation in saying this provision is unconstitutional, and I feel confident that it will not be in this bill when it is finally enacted into law.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. BARTLETT. What effect does the gentleman think it would have simply to make it prima facie evidence? This bill makes it conclusive evidence, to which the gentleman has referred. Now, what effect would it have to say that the findings between the United States Government and the corporations should be affirmative evidence of a violation of the law to be rebutted by the evidence?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman by saying I think that the words "in favor of," which precede the word "defendant," ought to be stricken out. The defendant has had his day in court. He has had his opportunity to be heard. It is proper that the decree should constitute a final estoppel as against him, but not as against some third person who was not a party to the original action and has had no opportunity to present his case.

Now, I wish to speak briefly in reference to section 8. It is the provision with reference to holding companies. It states:

SEC. 8. That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share, capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where the effect of such acquisition is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to create a monopoly of any line of trade in any section or community.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-five minutes, and the gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Every gentleman in the House who has made a study of the law applicable to this subject is aware that the creation of a holding company for the purpose of eliminating competition has been held to be a violation of the Sherman law, but if this section is enacted we will have to go further than to secure a conviction under the law. It provides at the bottom of page 25—

This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition.

In the Northern Securities case it was held that the mere potential power to bring about a monopoly or effect a lessening of competition was sufficient to bring the contract under the provisions of the Sherman law, but under provisions that we have in this bill it will be necessary to show that some step was actually taken in the way of preventing or lessening competition before the law will apply. This section is another instance where the law as it now stands is not strengthened, but weakened.

In the few minutes I have remaining I wish to speak very briefly with reference to section 12. This is the so-called "personal guilt" section, in which the committee seemed to take a special pride, and yet I have no hesitation in saying that it adds to the burden imposed upon the prosecutor by the law as it now stands. In other words, it will be more difficult to convict or bring about the conviction of any person under this section than it is now under the Sherman law. The Sherman law is personal in its provisions; it applies to persons as well as corporations. There is no difficulty in making guilt personal under it. Section 12 provides—

That whenever a corporation shall be guilty of the violation of any of the provisions of the antitrust laws, the offense shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation

It does not provide and could not provide in any constitutional way that the mere fact that a corporation has been found guilty should also establish the guilt of some official or director. This probably was in the mind of the gentlemen who prepared this section, and they found it necessary to add thereto—

Any director, officer, or agent who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of such prohibited act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

It follows that, under the provision of this section, the corporation must first be convicted. After the corporation is convicted the individual must be convicted, and, finally, after two convictions, the guilt is made personal.

Mr. GORDON. Do you claim that you can not prosecute the individual in a separate indictment without first prosecuting the corporation under the language referred to?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. So far as the provisions of this section are concerned, I do. If it does away with the provisions of the Sherman Act this would be necessary, because it expressly so states.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like to ask in what way can the corporation violate the law except through its managing officer?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It can not; and the provisions of the Sherman law consequently apply to them where they have actually taken part in the violation of the law.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was going to follow that and then ask if the Sherman law does not cover the case, if it is rigidly enforced, as it now stands upon the statutes?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If it is enforced at all, it covers it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This section only applies to a director, officer, or agent who shall have actually authorized, ordered, or done some of the prohibited acts, not of this section but of the antitrust laws. But whenever such facts are shown they become a crime under the Sherman law itself, and we have no need for this section whatever.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With pleasure.

Mr. SLOAN. Under that statute the officer who neglected to do the act he should have done and permitted the violation of the law is not covered in that statute, is he?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Very clearly not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes additional.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have not time to go over this bill as I would like; but I have shown, I think, with reference to these sections which are new, that instead of giving any additional force to the Sherman law they actually detract from its provisions and make it more difficult of enforcement. The criticisms we make upon this side are not because this law is not sufficiently drastic. We criticize because it adds little or nothing to the law as it now stands, because it confuses business and confounds business men by provisions that are indefinite, uncertain, and of doubtful legality or absolutely unconstitutional. Do gentlemen think they can make a decree stand against a person who was never a party to the original action? Do they think that they can single out one particular kind of merchants and leave out other kinds who stand in exactly the same position? Do they think it strengthens the law to enact definitions and then follow the definitions with a number of provisos? What we need, and what we ought to have—what we must have to stop the growth of monopoly in this country—is further provisions in reference to the effect which decrees shall have when enacted. I have introduced a bill which provides that in the case of a violation of the Sherman law the courts must impose a jail sentence. I think that would have some effect, but I do not think that that would accomplish the desired result by itself. The only way in which we can ever stop the growth of monopolies is by requiring all corporations engaged in interstate commerce to take out a Federal license, and then providing that when an action in equity is commenced and it is found that the defendants are violating the law an order shall first be issued restraining them from any further violation. It then should be provided that in event the order is violated not only that the officers of any offending corporation shall be in contempt of court, but also that the corporation itself shall forfeit its license to do interstate business.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Is it not the idea of the gentleman that the bill is not drastic enough?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not want the present law weakened in any particular. The bill does reach the deficiencies in the present system.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. It was your idea that it is not drastic enough, I take it from what you said.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know what the gentleman calls drastic. What I want is something that will make the present law more efficient; but I think this bill will weaken it in many respects.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. If the gentleman would get some of the letters that I have, he would think it is murder in the first degree.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, business men are more excited about what this law will accomplish than they need to be. There is not anything in it except a general disturbance of business, as I view it. It will not go beyond the Sherman law in any of the respects that I have mentioned.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. As the gentleman has shown, in section 12 there is an absolute reduction of the possibility of making guilt personal, is there not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is.

Mr. TOWNER. Because under the provisions of section 12, in order to prosecute an individual as an officer of the corporation who has authorized a violation of the law, it can only be done if the corporation has been indicted and convicted. and then must follow the indictment or conviction of the individual?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is correct if you proceed under this section and not under the old Sherman law.

Mr. TOWNER. Is not this a later expression of the law?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It was so intended.

Mr. TOWNER. And if it passes, will it not be, in effect, a repeal of all of the other laws with regard to those matters?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman states one of the many points where it will introduce confusion with reference to law which is now well settled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] has again expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below.

S. 2256. An act for the relief of James M. Campbell; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DEATH OF SENATOR WILLIAM O. BRADLEY, OF KENTUCKY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DONOVAN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. To object, Mr. Speaker; to object to the consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 526.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM O. BRADLEY, a Senator of the United States from the State of Kentucky.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That a committee of 16 Members be appointed on the part of the House to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following committee on the part of the House to attend the funeral: Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. STANLEY, Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. HELM, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. CANTRILL, Mr. FIELDS, Mr. ROUSE, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. LANGLEY, Mr. AUSTIN, Mr. KAHN, Mr. GREEN of Iowa, Mr. J. M. C. SMITH, Mr. SWITZER, and Mr. JOHNSON of Washington.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, under the order previously made, until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 26, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. WITHERSPOON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2319) to transfer Capt. Armistead Rust from the retired to the active list of the United States Navy, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 710), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 26, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou dost not confine Thyself in the revelations of Thyself to the forms of human speech. Thou hast not been discovered by the unassisted human intellect. Thou art more to us than a reasonable deduction. Thou dost speak to the hearts of men. Thy revelations have come to us in forms of mercy, and of love, and of patience, and of long suffering. Thou art still our God as Thou hast been the God of our fathers, and we lift not only our minds to Thee but our hearts. We pray that our whole life may be under the control of the will of God and in all our speech and action may we set forth the presence and power of Thy spirit in our lives. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE, UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, May 26, 1914.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate I appoint Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK, a Senator from the State of Nebraska, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

JAMES P. CLARKE,
President pro tempore.

Mr. HITCHCOCK thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer for the day and directed that the Journal of yesterday's proceedings be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. STONE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2860) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators.

The message also transmitted to the Senate resolutions of the House on the death of Hon. WILLIAM O. BRADLEY, late a Senator from the State of Kentucky.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. STANLEY, Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. HELM, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. CANTRILL, Mr. FIELDS, Mr. ROUSE, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. LANGLEY, Mr. AUSTIN, Mr. KAHN, Mr. GREEN of Iowa, Mr. J. M. C. SMITH, Mr. SWITZER, and Mr. JOHNSON of Washington the committee on the part of the House to attend the funeral of the deceased Senator.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to announce that on Friday next at any time that is proper I should like to make an address on the tolls question.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to announce that on Friday, May 29, at the close of the morning business and following the remarks of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], I shall address the Senate briefly on the Panama Canal tolls repeal bill.

DONIPHAN'S EXPEDITION INTO MEXICO.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have in my hand a very beautifully written and interesting account of the celebrated expedition led by Gen. Doniphan from Missouri into New Mexico and on to Chihuahua, old Mexico, and other points during the Mexican War. It is not very long, but is out of print. It was written by Mr. John T. Hughes, a member of the celebrated regiment or brigade led by Gen. Doniphan. I ask that it may be printed as a public document of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NORRIS. Before that is acted upon, I think we ought to have a quorum present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Lee, Md.
Bankhead	Clapp	Johnson	McLean
Brady	Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Martin, Va.
Bristow	Crawford	Kenyon	Nelson
Bryan	Culberson	Kern	Norris
Burton	Gallinger	La Follette	O'Gorman
Catron	Gronna	Lane	Page
Perkins	Simmons	Sutherland	Vardaman
Pittman	Smith, S. C.	Swanson	Weeks
Ransdell	Stephenson	Thompson	White
Shafroth	Sterling	Thornton	Williams
Sheppard	Stone	Tillman	Works

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is unavoidably absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] is necessarily absent on important business. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and his pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence on business of the Senate of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. GALLINGER. I announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the publication of a certain document, the title of which he will state.

Mr. STONE. It is entitled "Doniphan's Expedition." It is historical, of course. It is an account of Gen. Doniphan's expedition during the Mexican War in what is now New Mexico and on into Chihuahua, Durango, and other parts of Mexico, where he joined his forces with those of the American Army.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator was it an expedition during the War with Mexico, more than half a century ago?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. CATRON. Doniphan's expedition.

Mr. GALLINGER. Doniphan's expedition?

Mr. STONE. Doniphan. It is a beautifully written book, by John T. Hughes, who was an officer of the regiment. The book is out of print. It contains 144 pages.

Mr. GALLINGER. Was it printed by the Government, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. STONE. It was not. It was written by Mr. Hughes and printed a good long while ago. I was looking for the date. I do not find it on the title page.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have been in the habit recently of referring such matters as a rule to the Committee on Printing, and as a member of that committee I would suggest to the Senator if it goes there I will exert myself to have it reported out at an early day.

Mr. STONE. Of course, if it is desired to have it referred I will not press for immediate action.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is the better procedure.

Mr. STONE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STONE. I trust the book will not get lost. It will not be possible to replace it.

Mr. GALLINGER. We will try to take care of it, I will say to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a letter from Rev. C. F. Strutz, secretary of the Dakota Conference of the Evangelical Association, which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the letter was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

ZION EVANGELICAL CHURCH,
803 Sixth Avenue SE., Aberdeen, S. Dak., May 16, 1914.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA, Washington, D. C.

ESTEEMED SIR: On the above date the following resolution was unanimously adopted by the Dakota Conference of the Evangelical Association at its thirty-first annual session, held at Kidder, S. Dak., May 14 to 17, 1914. Said conference embraces North and South Dakota and a section of Montana and represents about 40,000 German-Americans:

"Resolution.

"Resolved, That this conference is in favor of the passage of the Sheppard-Hobson resolution now before Congress for a constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages, and we call upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence to secure its early adoption."

We German-Americans are not all in favor of license and "personal liberty," but resent the effort that is being made by the liquor interests to create the impression that the German-Americans are the unanimous champions of the liquor traffic. We regard such an insinuation a gross insult to a large number of our best citizens and emphatically enter protest.

Hoping that the above resolution will receive due attention at your hands, I beg to remain,

Yours, for happy homes and a sober citizenship.

C. F. STRUTZ,
Secretary of Dakota Conference.

Mr. GRONNA presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bartlett, N. Dak., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating beverages, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of the United Irish-American Societies of New York City; of Abraham Lincoln Branch, American Continental League, of Cohoes; and of Admiral Stewart Branch, American Continental League, of New York City, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against an appropriation for the celebration of the so-called "One hundred years of peace among English-speaking peoples," which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McLEAN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Bridgeport, Southport, East Haven, Westville, Waterbury, New Haven, Hartford, Meriden, Milford, North Branford, Wilson, Hartford, New Britain, and East Hartford, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Equal Franchise League, of Bedding, and a petition of sundry citizens of Moodus, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to grant equal suffrage to women, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Connecticut Piano Dealers' Association, praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent discrimination in prices and to provide for publicity of such prices, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Connecticut State Association of Letter Carriers, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation authorizing the closing of first and second class post offices on Sunday, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Common Council of Stamford, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented petitions of the Young Men's Christian Association of Connecticut, and of sundry citizens of Eastford, Conn., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Norwalk, Conn., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRAWFORD presented memorials of sundry citizens of Dell Rapids, Sioux Falls, and Rapid City, all in the State of South Dakota, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of McCook County, S. Dak., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented memorials of sundry citizens of Dallas, Waco, San Antonio, Runge, Galveston, Houston, Fort Worth, and Fort Bent, all in the State of Texas, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hillsboro, Tex., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I send to the desk a resolution adopted by the Southern Baptist Convention at Nashville, Tenn., May 14, which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That we, the Southern Baptist Convention, representing the white Baptists of the South, numbering more than two and a half millions, in annual session assembled on this the 14th day of May, 1914, in the city of Nashville, Tenn., do hereby heartily and unanimously favor national constitutional prohibition and will do all within our power to secure the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution forever prohibiting the sale, manufacture for sale, importation for sale, exportation or transportation for sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, or foods containing alcohol, in accordance with the joint resolution introduced in the United States Congress by Congressman RICHMOND PEARSON HOBSON and Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a question. It has been reported in the newspapers during the last few days that the joint resolution which was prepared and introduced by the Senator in this body and by Representative HOBSON in the other House had been abandoned in the House for at least this session. Can the Senator give us any information about the matter?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not think the report is true; in fact, I am sure it is not true. The proposed constitutional amendment has not been abandoned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Has it been abandoned for this session?

Mr. SHEPPARD. If it has been, I know nothing of any such action having been taken or contemplated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, does the Senator from Texas understand that it is not to be pressed in the other House at this session?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do not so understand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Texas, then, understands that it will be pressed in the other House?

Mr. SHEPPARD. So far as I know, it will be pressed in the House, and I know that I desire to press it in the Senate, and intend to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 5570) to increase the appropriation for the erection of an immigration station at Baltimore, Md., reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 552) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 3988) for the purchase of a building and lot as a mine rescue station at McAlester, Okla. (Rept. No. 553);

A bill (H. R. 14242) to increase the limit of cost for the erection and completion of the United States Federal building at Harrisburg, Pa. (Rept. No. 554);

A bill (H. R. 11254) to increase the limit of cost for the erection and completion of the United States post-office building at Mandan, N. Dak. (Rept. No. 555); and

A bill (H. R. 11747) to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of a site and the construction of a public building in Memphis, Tenn. (Rept. No. 556).

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 22) authorizing the appointment of a committee of Congress to attend the unveiling of a monument to President John Tyler at Richmond, Va., asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which was agreed to.

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14330) to prohibit the importation and entry of goods, wares, and merchandise made in whole or in part by convict, pauper, or detained labor, or made in whole or in part from materials which have been made in whole or in part or in any manner manipulated by convict or prison labor, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 557) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 5660) granting an increase of pension to James E. S. Pray (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 5662) providing for the collection of tolls from vessels passing through the canals at St. Marys Falls, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BRADY:

A bill (S. 5663) appropriating the sum of $100,000 for the construction of a system of wagon roads on the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation, in Kootenai County, Idaho, and providing the manner in which said appropriation shall be expended; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5664) relating to use of mails in effecting fire insurance, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 5665) to authorize the use of the property of the United States at Mount Weather, near Bluemont, Va., as a summer White House; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 5666) for the relief of Lucy A. Hughson, administratrix;

A bill (S. 5667) for the relief of Dr. S. W. Hobson; and

A bill (S. 5668) for the relief of the estate of Martin Matthew, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PERKINS:

A bill (S. 5669) for the relief of the retired officers of the Navy who were retired for physical disability incident to the service when due for promotion to the next higher grade; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 5670) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to establish the town site of Odanah, Wis., on the La Pointe or Bad River Reservation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 5671) granting an increase of pension to Walter H. Hutchinson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5672) granting an increase of pension to Harriet M. Marks (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 5673) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5674) confirming the title of Hannah Robinson to certain lands and authorizing and directing the issuance of patent therefor; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. THORNTON:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 150) providing for the taking for purposes of illustration of 30 specimens of Pribilof Islands fur seal from the collection of the United States National Museum; to the Committee on Fisheries.

MARINE HOSPITAL RESERVATION, CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Mr. BURTON. I introduce a bill which I desire to have properly referred. It is for the sale of a portion of the ground belonging to the Marine Hospital at Cleveland, Ohio. I am not sure to what committee the bill should be referred—whether to the Committee on Public Lands or to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read by title.

The bill (S. 5661) to provide for the sale of a portion of the United States Marine Hospital Reservation at Cleveland, Ohio, was read twice by title.

Mr. SWANSON. Such bills when they appertain to naval lands usually go to the Naval Committee and when they appertain to military lands to the Military Committee. Is this reservation under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department or of the War Department, I will ask the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BURTON. The marine hospital is under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department.

Mr. SWANSON. In that case I think the bill should be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. JONES submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment ratifying the conveyance by John Teopil and his wife, Susan, to John Robinson, of the west half of the southwest quarter of section 26, township 18 north, range 18 east, of the Willamette meridian, Washington, and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 377), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and it is hereby, authorized to continue the employment of an assistant clerk at $1,440 per annum, to be paid from "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate, until July 1, 1914.

INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL OF ARBITRATION.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I submit a resolution (S. Res. 376), which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution (S. Res. 376) was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas on the 4th day of April, 1908, there was concluded between the United States and Great Britain a convention to continue for the period of five years thereafter by which it was agreed among other things as follows:

ARTICLE 1.

Differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of the 29th of July, 1899, provided, nevertheless, that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States and do not concern the interests of third parties.

ARTICLE 2.

In each individual case the high contracting parties before appealing to the Permanent Court of Arbitration shall conclude a special agreement defining clearly the matter in dispute, the scope of the powers of the arbitrators, and the periods to be fixed for the formation of the arbitral tribunal and the several stages of the procedure. It is understood that such special agreements on the part of the United States will be made by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof; His Majesty's Government reserving the right before concluding a special agreement in any matter affecting the interests of a self-governing Dominion of the British Empire to obtain the concurrence therein of the Government of that Dominion;

Such agreements shall be binding only when confirmed by the two Governments by an exchange of notes; and

Whereas on the 21st day of February, 1914, the said convention was by the high contracting parties renewed for a further period of five years thereafter; and

Whereas by the convention concluded at the Second International Peace Conference, held at The Hague in 1907, to which convention the United States and Great Britain were both parties, it was agreed among other things that—

"In questions of a legal nature, and especially in the interpretation or application of international conventions, arbitration is recognized by the contracting parties as the most effective and at the same time the most equitable means of settling disputes which diplomacy has failed to settle"; and

Whereas it was further provided in the said convention that—

"The permanent court is competent for all arbitration cases, unless the parties agree to institute a special tribunal"; and

Whereas a dispute now exists between the United States and Great Britain as to the interpretation of certain provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, concluded between the United States and Great Britain on the 18th day of November, 1901, respecting the authority of the United States to relieve, in whole or in part, the ships of commerce of its citizens from the payment of tolls which may be exacted from the ships of commerce or of war of other nations or the citizens of other nations for the use of the Panama Canal:

Resolved, That the President be, and he hereby is, requested to open diplomatic negotiations with the Government of Great Britain with a view to the conclusion of a special agreement between the United States and Great Britain for the appointment of an impartial international tribunal of arbitration and for the submission to and the determination by such tribunal of such dispute.

RATES ON SUGAR.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 375), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it hereby is, requested to transmit to the Senate the transcript of testimony taken before the commission in the matter of application of R. H. Countiss, agent, in behalf of transcontinental carriers, for relief under the provisions of the fourth section, with respect to rates on sugar from points in California and other States to Chicago, Ill., now pending before the commission.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. KERN, it was Ordered, That FRANCIS S. WHITE, junior Senator from Alabama, be appointed chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Senator Bradley.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFEREE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the other day I was appointed one of the conferees on the Agricultural appropriation bill, but I find that my duties with the Commerce Committee in the consideration of the river and harbor bill are taking up all of my time. I therefore ask to be relieved from further service as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Oregon will be excused from further service, and the Chair appoints the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to fill the vacancy.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on May 25, 1914, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 65. An act to amend an act entitled "An act providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof," approved April 12, 1910;

S. 1243. An act directing the issuance of patent to John Russell; and

S. 5289. An act to provide for warning signals on vessels working on wrecks or engaged in dredging or other submarine work, and to amend section 2 of the act approved June 7, 1897, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States."

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON NEUROLOGY (H. DOC. NO. 997).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of a provision contained in the deficiency act of March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law," I transmit herewith, for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation and the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of Switzerland to that of the United States to send delegates to an International Congress on Neurology, Psychiatry, and Psychology, to be held at Berne, Switzerland, from September 7 to September 12, 1914, and a letter from the Department of the Interior showing the views of that department with regard to the proposed congress and recommending an appropriation of not to exceed $500 to defray the expenses of participation by the Government of the United States.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 26, 1914.

SIXTH INTERNATIONAL DENTAL CONGRESS (H. DOC. NO. 998).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of a provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law," I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the British Government to that of the United States to send delegates to the Sixth International Dental Congress, to be held at London from August 3 to 8, 1914, and a letter from the Department of the Interior showing the favor with which that department views the proposed gathering.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 26, 1914.

POST-OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 373) submitted by Mr. JONES on the 23d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to transmit to the Senate the following information:

1. The names, ages, and length of service of those employees in the department in the District of Columbia and in the post office in Washington City who served in any war of the United States and who have been demoted, discharged, or resignations called for since March 4, 1914.

2. The rating of efficiency of each of such employees on March 4, 1914, and the rating with which they were credited at the date of demotion, discharge, or when resignation was called for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of appealing to the Senate to devote the time from now until 1 o'clock to the consideration of the calendar. There never has been a time in my experience here when we have had one-half as many bills accumulated on the calendar as we have now. There are between two and three hundred bills and resolutions, and we could dispose of a good many of them before the morning hour closes if we were permitted to take up the calendar.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I was about to ask unanimous consent to take up a certain bill on the calendar; but since the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has asked to take up the calendar, I shall forego the request. I hope we may reach the bill in the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. Is it the wish of the Senator from New Hampshire to proceed to the consideration of the first bill on the calendar?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that I had given notice that I should submit some remarks on yesterday; and the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] was to speak to-day. He understands that I am to come in ahead of him. I have no objection personally to going on with the calendar, but I do not know just how he will feel about delaying his speech in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the request is to proceed with the calendar only until 1 o'clock.

Mr. JONES. Yes; and I have no objection to that myself; but the Senator from Louisiana understands that he is to come in to-day right after the conclusion of my address. He may not like to be delayed as long as this course would delay him.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether there is any difficulty about both speeches being made between the hours of 1 and 6 o'clock?

Mr. JONES. I do not know. I shall take probably about two hours or two hours and a half. I understand the remarks of the Senator from Louisiana are to be at least that long. As I said, it makes no difference to me; but he and I had that understanding about my coming in, and I do not know whether he would like to be delayed so long as that.

Mr. KERN. I will ascertain later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands three Senators have given notices for to-day. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order at this time.

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 655) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to survey the lands of the abandoned Fort Assiniboine Military Reservation and open the same to settlement was announced as next in order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, that bill was put over, I think, and the following joint resolution, at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the last time the calendar was under consideration. Neither of the Senators from Montana is here. I do not want to object to the consideration of the bill, but I call attention to that fact. I think under the circumstances this bill and the following one had better be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the joint resolution be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2242) making it unlawful for any Member of Congress to serve on or solicit funds for any political committee, club, or organization was announced as next in order.

Mr. BURTON. I ask that that bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RIGHT OF WAY NEAR ENGLE, N. MEX.

The bill (S. 3112) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain right of way near Engle, N. Mex., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been twice read in full.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, on page 1, line 8, after the word "Dam," to strike out "and as the consideration for such conveyance there shall be continuously furnished to said railway company from the water impounded above Elephant Butte Dam, now under construction by the Reclamation Service" and insert "and as the consideration for such conveyance the railway company shall be permitted to take from the water impounded above Elephant Butte Dam, now under construction by the Reclamation Service," and, on page 2, line 8, after the word "month," to insert the following proviso: "Provided, That neither the United States nor its successors in interest shall be held liable for or obligated to supply the water hereinbefore described, but in the event that the United States or its successors in interest shall abandon the use of the land upon which the said Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway has its said right of way for a reservoir site as herein contemplated, said right of way so far as the same may be conveyed to the United States hereunder shall revert to the said railway company," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized to receive on behalf of the United States from the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. the conveyance of so much of said company's pipe-line right of way from a point near Engle, N. Mex., to the Rio Grande River as will be flooded by the Elephant Butte Dam; and as the consideration for such conveyance the railway company shall be permitted to take from the water impounded above Elephant Butte Dam, now under construction by the Reclamation Service, and which will flood such right of way, such quantity of water as the Secretary of the Interior may find to be necessary for the operation of said company's railway, but not exceeding 30,000,000 gallons of water per month: Provided, That neither the United States nor its successors in interest shall be held liable for or obligated to supply the water hereinbefore described, but in the event that the United States or its successors in interest shall abandon the use of the land upon which the said Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway has its said right of way for a reservoir site as herein contemplated, said right of way so far as the same may be conveyed to the United States hereunder shall revert to the said railway company.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, who introduced the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was introduced by the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON], and reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. REED. I have here a note that was handed me, stating that the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is interested in the bill and desires to have it go over until his return.

Mr. CATRON. I will state that the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has agreed with me to waive his objection and let the bill go through. His colleague will inform the Senator from Missouri that that is the fact.

Mr. REED. Just one moment. Mr. President——

Mr. CATRON. Unless the Senator has changed his course, that was his agreement with me. I do not know what he may have done in the last few days.

Mr. REED. In view of the request that has been made of me, although I dislike very much to delay the matter under the statement of the Senator from New Mexico, I feel that I ought to ask to have the bill go over for one day until I can ascertain whether the senior Senator from Colorado has changed his mind since he saw the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CATRON. The chances are about a thousand to one that we will not get at it any more if it goes over for a day.

Mr. REED. Oh, there will be another opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] was not in the Chamber when the calendar was taken up. I learn from him that he will be seriously inconvenienced if not permitted to go on with his speech within reasonable bounds. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings under the calendar be suspended.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no interest in a single bill on the calendar, and I have no desire to urge its consideration. I regret that the Senate has permitted the calendar to become so voluminous as it is. Under the circumstances, I think the request that the unfinished business should be laid before the Senate is a proper one; and hence I shall not insist upon considering the calendar.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, inasmuch as this notice has been given, I agree that the Senator from Louisiana should be permitted to go forward now and make his speech, but I venture the hope that immediately after the conclusion of his speech we may return to the calendar.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, that can not very well be done, because three Senators have given notice of an intention to address the Senate to-day. I do not think an effort should be made to take up the time of the Senate to-day with the consideration of the general calendar. I am sure the Senator from New Hampshire would not have made the request if he had been aware that three speeches were to be made to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I certainly would not have made it, and I very gladly concur in the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SHIVELY. I was unaware of it, too; but I do not think anyone will contend that there has been a disposition to consume time unduly on the calendar.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a moment ago I asked to have Senate bill 3112 laid over until to-morrow. I withdraw the objection, and am willing that it shall be considered now. I have seen the colleague of Senator THOMAS.

Mr. CATRON. I ask that the consideration of the bill may be resumed.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, of course I shall not object to the request for unanimous consent which has been made by the distinguished Senator from Indiana; but I must say that before I can give unanimous consent I shall ask the Senate to consider a couple of bills that I have reported, and which have been on the calendar for some time. The calendar must be reached sooner or later.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the bill in which the Senator from New Mexico is interested was before the Senate, and the objection has been withdrawn, so it ought to be considered.

Mr. CATRON. I ask that it be now taken up.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3112) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain right of way near Engle, N. Mex.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] has asked unanimous consent that the further consideration of the calendar be dispensed with and that we proceed with the speeches of which notice have been given for to-day. I note that notices have been given for Thursday. Friday has been left vacant so far as any notice to address the Senate is concerned. It would seem to me that we ought to have an understanding that next Friday—for which no notice has been given, as I understand—the calendar will be taken up and considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that two notices have since been given for Friday.

Mr. SWANSON. Has any notice been given for Saturday?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not so far as the Chair has heard.

Mr. SWANSON. I think, then, it would be well for the Senate to have an understanding that next Saturday we will take up the calendar. The congestion of the calendar is very great.

Mr. KENYON. Saturday will be Memorial Day.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. KERN. I suggest to the Senator that there is a general sentiment that the calendar ought to be taken up, and I think there will be no trouble about taking it up at the very first opportunity.

Mr. SWANSON. The opportunity is generally dispensed with by notices being given. I think the calendar is a very important matter. Every Senator has bills on it, and I will ask an understanding that next Monday we shall take up the calendar and devote the entire day to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] that further proceedings under the calendar be dispensed with, and that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, unless we can have an understanding that at some time in the near future we will take up the calendar, I must object. There are hundreds of bills pending before the Senate that ought to be passed, and unless we can fix a day when the business of the Senate will be taken up, much as I dislike to do so, I must object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An objection is heard.

Mr. KENYON. I will ask the Senator from Indiana why we should not take up the calendar at evening sessions and get through with it.

Mr. KERN. I should be very glad to do that.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, the Panama Canal bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President—

We favor the exemption of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

That is a provision from the national Democratic platform, 1912.

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest, honest men, who intend to do business along those lines, and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

That is an extract from a speech delivered during the campaign of 1912 by the then candidate for the Presidency, Mr. Wilson.

A party that violates its platform pledges is unworthy, and deserves the scorn of honest men. * * * When my party acts, whether its actions be right or wrong, so long as I remain a member thereof, I shall steadfastly support its platform demands.

That is an extract from a speech made by Representative HENRY, chairman of the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives, one of the leaders of his party in that body.

If a man after election finds that his platform contains something which he can not honestly support, what ought he to do? * * * He should resign and let the people select a man to do what they would have him do. * * * A platform is binding upon every honest man.

That is an extract from a speech delivered by Hon. William J. Bryan, Secretary of State under the present administration.

Mr. President, Congress is confronted with the most amazing proposition that has been presented since the foundation of the Government. The repeal of a law is demanded that has not yet gone into effect and which was indorsed by practically every one who sought the suffrage of the people in the last election. Those who declared when the law was passed that our action was well within our treaty rights are now arguing most strenuously that we violated our treaty obligations. Others who voted to exempt our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls after weeks of discussion, and with no suggestion that such exemption was a subsidy, now vociferously condemn such action as a vicious subsidy to a hated monopoly. With Huertaan ingenuity reasons of the most diverse kind are sought and given to sustain the claim of England and discredit our own rights. When driven from one position another is taken inconsistent with the former until we are so bewildered with the kaleidoscopic changes of views and inconsistent positions that we do not know whether one who is for repeal this minute may not be against it the next. I am reminded of a verse like this:

It wriggled and twisted and turned about
Until the beholder was left in doubt.
Whether the snake that made the track
Was going south or coming back.

That we have not violated any treaty obligation by the exemption of our coastwise ships is so plain to me that I can not comprehend how anyone can take a different position. Those on the other side may look at this situation in the same way. In what I say, however, I want it distinctly understood that I do not question the intelligence, the motive, the sincerity, or the patriotism of anyone who does not agree with me, and however strong may be the language used by me it does not apply to the individual in any way, but simply expresses feebly how the action taken or proposed appears to me. As simply and as plainly as possible I am going to try to express my views on a question that I consider of the most far-reaching importance economically and as involving the very independence and sovereignty of the Nation itself, conceding to those who differ from me the same devotion to justice and national honor that I claim for myself. If my language should seem strong, it is not so strong as I feel or as I would like to use.

I would say nothing to wound or grieve the President. His is the most trying position in the Republic. Upon his action, his word, his decision, may depend the happiness of our people, the prosperity of the Nation, and the lives of its citizens. As that tremendous responsibility bears down upon him and he realizes his own weakness and his own fallibility it is no wonder that the burden seems more than he can bear. He should have the sympathy, aid, and assistance of every one of us, and he will get it if he will take it. I know he wants to do what is right; I know he is striving with all his power to promote the welfare of the people; I know he is patriotic, but I also know that he is not infallible and that his life's work has not been such as to fit him for wise action and a safe decision upon many of the problems that he must meet. I want it understood by him and by all that I impute to him the sincerest motives and the loftiest purposes, although I may condemn in unmeasured terms the action his judgment may have led him to take or recommend. The consequences of unwise action may be disastrous, and yet the motives be the purest and highest.

We own a strip of territory 10 miles wide across the Isthmus of Panama. We bought it from the Republic of Panama and paid for it out of the Treasury of the United States. All sovereignty over it was expressly granted to us forever. Through it and entirely within it we have constructed the Panama Canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific and furnish a great water highway for the ships of the world. It has cost us practically $400,000,000. It will cost us from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 a year to maintain and operate it. We also are obligated to protect, maintain, and defend it.

This canal is ours and entirely within our territory. This is conceded by all.

Two years ago, preparatory to the opening and use of this great canal, Congress, after the most careful consideration and full discussion, passed a law under which the vessels of the United States engaged in the coastwise trade are permitted to pass through the canal without the payment of tolls. Every phase of the question—foreign, economic, and political—was discussed and weighed before we passed it. Our action was deliberate and open. The President approved the act and filed a strong statement upholding the legal right to enact it. Practically everybody accepted it as a wise policy.

It is true that some of those who opposed the passage of this law urged its repeal from time to time, but they were not taken seriously. An election was held subsequent to the passage of the act. No issue was made against it. In fact all parties declared themselves for it, and all the leading candidates for the presidency declared publicly in favor of it. No one thought for a moment that the representatives of the people who had been elected upon the express approval of the action of Congress in passing this law would so far forget their representative capacity as to violate their professions, forget their promises, and defy the almost unanimous wish of the people and vote for the repeal of this law without giving the people an opportunity to say whether they desired this done or not.

The President of the United States, notwithstanding his professions in the campaign, notwithstanding the unequivocal declaration in his party platform, has solemnly asked Congress to repeal this law. Why? The people have a right to know why, and we, their representatives, should tell them why, and why we vote for its repeal if we so vote. The very principle of representative government is at stake. If those selected to represent and legislate for the people deliberately repudiate the issues upon which they were selected, then representative government is a farce.

Under the circumstances it would seem that anyone urging the repeal of this law should present strong and weighty reasons for such action. In asking Congress to repeal a law which it had passed and which he had approved, we have a right to expect that the President would state fully and clearly the reasons which impelled him to change his mind and ask us to retrace our steps so deliberately taken. Has he done so? The people have great confidence in the President, and so have I. They believe him to be honest, sincere, and patriotic; so do I. They do not believe him to be infallible; nor do I. They will follow him when he is right; so will I. They will forsake him when he is wrong, and so will I, except that when he is face to face with an enemy of our country, and then I will be with him, right or wrong. We expected, and the people expected, the reason for this action to be given in his message. What does he say?

He says, "in my judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view." That is all on that ground. No reason is given, no fact is stated to show why it is wrong. Should we not have the reasons and the considerations that led him to a conclusion directly opposed to his public declarations to the people when soliciting their support? He declared it then to be economically wise, and gave good reasons for that judgment. Surely, the people are entitled to his reasons for his change of view if we, as their representatives, are not.

Then he says this exemption "is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain." That is a strong statement from one who took a directly opposite position only a year ago. He was mistaken then, or he is mistaken now, and the very fact that he has taken both positions refutes the statement that it is a plain violation of the treaty, because we must assume that he was sincere in taking the other position as we must assume that he is sincere now. If it is now so plainly contrary to the terms of that treaty, would it not have been fair and just for him to point out how he came to take the opposite position before and wherein it is so plain now? With all due respect, I think so. The mere dictum of President Wilson is no more convincing than the contrary position of candidate Wilson.

I have come to state to you a fact and a situation.

Then he says:

Whatever may be our differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

This is an amazing statement in view of the actual facts. If made by anyone other than the President of the United States, it would be most severely characterized. The President does not state a fact when he says the meaning of this treaty is not debated outside the United States, and that its language is given but one interpretation and that against us. Not only in other countries but in England itself, where self-interest would naturally incline the people against us and our contention, this question has been debated and men of high character and great ability have dared to declare that our action is not contrary to the treaty.

Mr. C. A. Hereshoff, a noted English writer on international law, says:

There is no evasion of the rule of equality where all foreign vessels are subject to the same duties and liabilities under similar circumstances. The treaty could never have been intended to prevent the Federal Government from arranging and regulating its domestic and coastwise commerce and in the use and enjoyment of its own property as it saw fit. No such restriction could have been in view in adopting "as the basis for neutralization" a rule that the canal should be free and open to vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality. It would be absurd for the United States to solemnly declare that its own vessels of war might openly and freely navigate its own landlocked waterways and enjoy the privileges that belong to the Nation as a sovereign power in the use of its own territory. The use of the words "vessels of war" shows plainly that the word "vessel" as used refers only and exclusively to those of all nations other than those of the United States, and that the word "nations" was restricted to foreign nations; that is to say, nations foreign to the United States.

Edward S. Cox-Sinclair, in the London Law Review of November, 1912, closes a carefully written article as follows:

To sum up, it is reasonably arguable:
(a) That the United States can support its action on the precise words of the material articles of the treaty; that its case is strengthened by reference to the preamble and context; and that its case is difficult to challenge on the ground of general justice.
(b) There is no international obligation to submit the construction of its legislative act to any process or arbitration.
(c) That any aggrieved party has an appropriate and impartial and a competent tribunal in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Butte, the German jurist, said:

From the standpoint of abstract justice the pretension of Great Britain that she should be put on the same footing as respected the use and enjoyment of the Panama Canal as the United States seems presumptuous.

Count Reventlow, the noted German authority, says:

That the United States had a right to construe the treaty as Taft did can not be doubted.

Certain Italian deputies, of the Italian Government, are quoted as follows:

The Duke de Cesaro:

As a matter of strict justice, no nation, treaties or no treaties, has a right to exact the repeal of the exempting clause as long as the United States does not oppose the granting of a subsidy by a European Government to its ships using the canal.
On the other hand, no European nation could prevent the United States from granting a subsidy equal to the yearly total of canal tolls it pays to each company. From my viewpoint, the attitude of a nation exacting such a repeal is inexplicable.

Enrico Bonnaro said:

Italy considers the exemption clause as purely of an internal character. For this reason is not interested in its repeal. Besides, Italy considers the chief duty of any nation is to develop its own marine.

Mr. Timascheff, Russian minister of trade, is quoted as saying:

I consider the repeal of the clause in question to be most unfair to the people of the United States, considering the fact that they have furnished the money for the undertaking for the purpose of getting their own merchandise through the canal for their greatest benefit.

Then the President says that in all other countries a construction different from ours is given. Why do not they quote those of other countries who question our position? I have looked in vain for such quotations. It is significant that none are disclosed.

The President then says:

The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do—a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood.

Our position is not everywhere questioned; it is not everywhere misunderstood. Those nations interested are great, powerful, and intelligent. They claim their rights and more, and they expect us to claim ours. They know that they look at this matter from their standpoint, and they expect us to look at it from our standpoint. If they can get more than they are entitled to they will take it; and if they think we are giving it to them to get their good will, or from fear or servility, they will secretly despise us, and look about to see where they can exact something else from us. The "large thing" for us to do is to stand firmly for our rights and the rights of our citizens; and our right to do so will not be questioned or misunderstood anywhere, but our action in doing so will command regard and respect.

Again, he says:

We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

This is an amazing declaration. We never acquired a reputation for generosity by giving up our rights, but by adhering firmly to them and conceding to others their rights. No nation can secure the respect of other nations by confessing that it is wrong when it believes it is right. The interest of the Nation in this case is the interest of its citizens, and the nation that gives away the rights of its citizens in order to secure a reputation for generosity will secure nothing but the contempt and ridicule of other nations and peoples and be pointed to with scorn and jeers. A reputation bought at such a price is too dear for a self-respecting people to pay, even at the behest of a President whose honesty of purpose, purity of motive, and ardent patriotism no one will question.

He concludes this most remarkable message with a request for the passage of this bill—"I ask this of you"—and a confession of his inability to deal with some unknown and mysterious "matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence * * * I shall not know how to deal with other matters * * * if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure." That is all. What are these matters of "greater delicacy and nearer consequence"? We can not find out. That side of the Chamber does not know. The Speaker of the House of Representatives, and a Democrat who should be in the confidence of the President, says he does not know what they are. The Senator from Missouri, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, does not know of any such delicate matters—and if there were any he surely would know of them. In fact, he says there are none. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], said to be the spokesman of the administration on this floor, does not know. The honorable Secretary of State gave out a long statement a short time ago supporting this repeal proposition, but in it he did not refer to or even hint at any of these delicate matters. He knows of none, and if there were any surely he would know of them. We are entitled to know of these matters of nearer consequence, if any there be. We have to do with foreign relations. We would be glad to aid the President with advice and counsel and any other proper assistance that we could give. Surely if he had good reasons, he would acquaint us with them. Surely he would give them to his party associates and leaders, anyway. He has not.

The only conclusion that we can come to, that we are forced to, is that there are no such matters. A study of this message forces one to the conclusion—the only charitable one that can be reached—that the President believes his word, his request, his demand, is enough, and all he deems necessary is to say to Congress, "Repeal this law simply because I want it done," and why he has reversed himself and why he wants it done is left to speculation, in which we must not indulge if we would preserve our respect for and confidence in the wisdom of the President. The Democratic majority refuses to call for any information, and none of the resolutions introduced for that purpose have been reported one way or another.

We are urged to repeal this law on the ground of national honor. The high moral sense of the people is appealed to. Senators beat their breasts, lift their eyes to high heaven, and with outstretched hands appeal for the preservation of the national honor. They know the scrupulous regard the American people have for their honor. They are most jealous of it and would sacrifice all to maintain and uphold it, and hence it is sought to secure strength or support for this proposition by appealing for the preservation of the national honor. By their vehemence our friends confess that their cause is without merit. What right have they to assume that we are not just as jealous of the national honor as they? What right have they to intimate that because we do not believe as they do that we are regardless of our country's honor? Why do they call us hypocrites and Pharisees because their views are not followed? Why are we charged with insincerity and injustice because our views do not accord with theirs? Why do they insinuate that we are not following our honest convictions when we vote against repeal? Why do they intimate that we are controlled by railroad prejudices? Why do they charge that our action is based on our hatred of some country or people rather than upon honest conviction? Away with these vulpine insinuations and intimations. Let your cause rest or fall upon its merits. We are as patriotic as you are. We are as jealous of our country's honor as you are. We are as true to our honest convictions as you are. We would have our country maintain its obligations at whatever cost, and you have no right to arrogate to yourselves all devotion to the fulfillment of our treaty obligations.

You would maintain the national honor by an unconditional surrender; we would maintain it by insisting upon what we believe to be clearly our rights. You would maintain it by granting demands without considering whether they are right or wrong, so as to acquire a reputation for generosity; we would maintain it by a wise and firm insistence upon our own rights while generously dealing with others and giving to them all that they are entitled to in law or equity. You would maintain our honor by granting the unwarranted and unjust demands of foreigners, regardless of the promises you have made to our own people; we would maintain it by complying with all reasonable demands consistent with keeping faith with our own people. You resolve every doubt and seek every reason against our own people; we frankly confess that we seek every possible reason in support of our own citizens and resolve every doubt in favor of our own country. This is not discreditable; it is not dishonorable; it is not repudiation. Agreements with nations are to be kept, regardless of consequences; but covenants with our own people should also be held sacred and their rights maintained.

What is it that we are asked to do? It is an astounding act. I doubt if the people have fully grasped its significance; and when they do, there will such a wave of indignation sweep over the land that those who have proposed it will be literally overwhelmed. We are asked to confess that we deliberately violated a solemn treaty obligation. We are asked to acknowledge that the Congress of the United States and the President of the United States were so regardless of the national honor that they boldly, knowingly, and deliberately passed a law that is in "plain contravention" of a solemn treaty with a friendly nation. To uphold the Nation's honor we are asked to confess its dishonor. What could be more humiliating? What could be more dishonorable. What action on our part could more discredit us among the nations of the earth? What sort of a reputation would that give us? Do this thing, and we will merit the scorn and ridicule of every self-respecting people. If it was not in plain contravention of our treaty, we should not convict ourselves of dishonoring the Nation by repealing a law asserting the Nation's rights and maintaining our sovereignty over our own property and our domestic trade.

I have received a few letters—a very few—from people in my State urging the repeal of this law on the ground that it is in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and in every case they put it upon the ground that it violates the plain terms of that treaty. I am satisfied they have not studied it. They have simply taken some of the words of the treaty that are quoted by those who favor the repeal and who take certain words from the context and give them the meaning which they have when standing alone, and from this argue that the treaty has been violated. That we have not violated a treaty by this legislation ought to be reasonably certain from the character and ability of those who have sustained our right to pass it. Our right to pass this legislation without violating any treaty is sustained by Theodore Roosevelt, a President of the United States, and a man of scrupulous honor, wide learning, and lofty patriotism; by William H. Taft, a President of the United States, and a lawyer of the greatest ability and a man of wide diplomatic experience; by Woodrow Wilson, a candidate for President of the United States on the Democratic ticket, and a man of the highest character and a scholar of great learning; by Richard Olney, former Secretary of State and a lawyer of great ability and a man of much learning and wide experience; by Philander C. Knox, a United States Senator, former Attorney General, and Secretary of State, and a lawyer of splendid ability; by the House of Representatives; by the Senate of the United States by a vote of 44 to 11; by every Democratic Senator that voted upon the proposition; by the Democratic convention, in which were many of the present Democratic Senators and the present Secretary of State, William J. Bryan; by the Progressive Party in its platform; by the Republican Party through its leaders; by 13,000,000 American voters; by international lawyers of England, Germany, and other countries of world-wide reputation for learning and ability. This array of character, learning, ability, and patriotism ought to convince anyone that there must be some basis for the claim that we have the right to make this exemption, and that in doing so we do not violate any treaty and have not dishonored ourselves.

What more is needed? We could safely stop right here and let the matter rest.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not apply to the Panama Canal; it was never intended to apply to it, because its construction was not contemplated and there was no thought of the construction of a canal through territory belonging to the United States when the treaty was entered into by the two Governments. Conditions under which the Panama Canal was constructed are wholly different from the conditions existing at the time of the making of the treaty and of those contemplated by the treaty. While it was thought that the United States might construct the canal itself, there was no thought that it would be constructed through its own territory, but the whole thought was that it would be built through the territory of another jurisdiction under lease or some concession in the nature of a lease.

Admitting for the sake of argument that England had some rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that formed a consideration for the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, she had no rights that could form the basis of a consideration for affecting the Panama Canal, because the Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not in any way affect or have in mind the territory traversed by the Panama Canal. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not by any possible construction affect any territory or country except Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, and Central America; and there is no reason whatever for contending that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty covered any territory beyond that included in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Panama was no part of Central America. It was a part of Colombia, and Colombia is and was a part of South America, and always has been so regarded. French parties had attempted to construct this canal. They had concessions, and no one knew but that they would eventually build the canal. This was the situation contemplated by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That situation was entirely changed in the canal that was built. No route was secured or taken in Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or in any part of Central America, but the United States bought the rights of the French company and its property.

Panama seceded from Colombia and sold to the United States a strip of her territory 10 miles wide across the Isthmus of Panama and transferred to it all of her sovereignty over the same forever, and through that territory the United States built this canal. We are entirely within our rights and within the policy followed by Great Britain herself in insisting that by reason of the wholly changed conditions the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not and can not be made to apply to the Panama Canal. Suppose when we acquired the Panama strip we had acquired the entire territory from the southern boundary of the United States to the southern limits of the Panama Canal Zone and our sovereignty had been extended over this whole territory: is there anyone who with reason could contend that we could not then have constructed a canal wherever we pleased, free from the control of Great Britain? And yet our control of the territory through which it would pass would have been no more secure under those circumstances than it is now.

England invoked this rule in her own defense when she was accused by the European powers with violation of the neutrality provisions of the Suez Canal convention. In a convention of the powers a protest was made against the action of Great Britain, and Lord Pauncefote, the joint author of the Hay Pauncefote treaty, stated the position of Great Britain as follows:

> That Egypt having become British territory since the construction of the canal and the agreement between the powers, Great Britain could not be bound by the neutrality provisions adopted, so far as they affected Egypt, because it was a recognized principle of international law that treaties are only operative so long as the basic or fundamental conditions upon which they are based continue, and that in the event of a fundamental change, such as a change of sovereignty of the soil, any nation which is a party to such treaty could honorably contend that it was inoperative as to her newly acquired territory.

Apply this language to the conditions with which we are now concerned and England has no basis for her claim.

If Great Britain could make such a claim regarding the Suez, how does it happen that we lose our "reputation for generosity" for making this claim with much greater reason?

We are not legally or morally bound under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to observe its stipulations, even if it can by any possible stretch of the imagination be conceived to embrace this canal, because the treaty-making power was without jurisdiction to limit, restrict, or affect the use of this canal and the territory through which it passes. Not only the canal but the territory through which it passes is the property and territory of the United States. This treaty purports to limit and affect not only our use of the canal itself but it purports to restrict, limit, and affect our use of the territory through which it passes, which Great Britain herself concedes to be our territory. The Constitution of the United States, which should control us in our action rather than the demands of any foreign country, and which should be recognized as controlling the action and authority of the respective branches of the Government, expressly provides:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

This is a specific and definite grant to Congress—not the treaty-making power—and no branch of the Government can invade that authority, and if it attempted to do it such attempt would be void and of no obligatory force. If it can be held that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is applicable to the Panama Canal and Zone, it must be assumed that it was entered into by both parties with the full knowledge of this constitutional provision, and Great Britain clearly understood that any stipulations in this treaty could not "affect" the property of the United States without the action of Congress itself and that Congress was under no obligation, legal or moral, to pass the rules and regulations agreed upon by the treaty-making power, the same being beyond its jurisdiction. The treaty is not self-executing. Congress must act and Congress is free to act as it may deem wise and beneficial. This was known to Great Britain, too, and to all nations, and neither she nor they can complain if Congress acts within its powers.

Tucker, in his work on the Constitution, says:

> In favor of the extreme claim of power for the President and Senate it has been urged that a contract between the United States and a foreign nation must be conclusive against all departments of the Government, because it is a contract; but the answer to this contention is obvious and conclusive. It involves the petitio principii by assuming that the contract is complete though it trenches upon the power of the other departments of the Government without their consent. And if it be further urged that foreign nations know no party in the contract on the part of the United States except the President and Senate the answer is equally conclusive that if our Constitution requires the consent of the departments to a treaty of the nature referred to the foreign nation is bound to take notice of that fact, and can not claim a completed obligation in the absence of the consent of the other departments. The maxim upon this subject is familiar: Qui cum alio contrahit vel est, vel debet esse, non ignarus conditionis ejus. And if it be further urged that this is too refined a doctrine to regulate our delicate relations with foreign powers the answer is that the treaty-making power of the Crown of Great Britain, where it involves a concession of the clear and absolute power of Parliament, has never been recognized as valid by the English Government and has never been enforced. The Queen may make a treaty to pay $10,000,000 to the French Government, but unless Parliament appropriates the money the treaty will be ineffectual. * * * We may suggest a further limitation: A treaty can not compel any department of the Government to do what the Constitution submits to its exclusive and absolute will. * * * We have seen from the Constitution that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, to which the Senate may or may not assent, and the President may veto; but if the President and Senate have the power to regulate the system of taxation and revenue by treaty without the consent of Congress then the House of Representatives, which, by the terms of the Constitution, is made the originating body for such bills, without whose primal action the President and Senate can have no voice whatever in the matter, is to be excluded from any consent to the terms of the treaty of the President and Senate, who, by the constitutional method, are not entitled to act at all until the House of Representatives has inaugurated a bill. * * * These results demonstrate the fatal disturbance of the equilibrium of the Constitution which would arise from any such construction as would give the President and Senate the right by treaty with a foreign power to regulate the internal concerns of the country.

Congress has acted. It has made the rules which it deemed wise for the use of our property. We did not believe we were violating any treaty obligation when we passed that legislation and we do not think so now. We are asked, however, to repeal that legislation, and the question is presented in such a way that if we do repeal it the world will take our act to be a confession that we have been guilty of deliberately violating our treaty obligations and a confession that we can not hereafter repeal this repealing act if we find it to have been unwise. Our duty is plain, our course clear. If in his message the President had not declared that our act was in violation of our treaty obligations, and that all nations so regarded it, but had asked for its repeal on economic grounds and because it would be wise to do it on account of our peculiar diplomatic relations, we could have acted then without putting ourselves in a position to foreclose future action, but the issue is now a far greater and more far-reaching one. The real issue now is not what ought we to do, but what must we do. If the exemption is a violation of the legal obligations of a treaty, we must repeal it. That ends it. If we have shackeled ourselves for all time to come, we must bear our chains and meekly submit to be dragged in the dust of England's commercial chariot, because of the incompetence and stupidity of our own diplomats and statesmen.

Mr. President, the very unwisdom of the course we are asked to follow is enough in itself to raise a doubt as to its necessity, and I should resolve such doubt in favor of our own people and our own interest. The wise course, the just course, and the patriotic course is to allow the action taken by a preceding Congress and approved by our President to stand. Let us give the world to understand that these were wise and just men and that we are not going to brand them as faithless to our treaty obligations. Let us affirm their assertion of our right to deal with our own property as we see fit, and then in the future we can determine upon its merits whether it is economically wise to maintain this policy or not. To admit our lack of power now makes us subservient forever to England's shipping power and the transcontinental railroads, to assert and maintain it preserves to us the power to do in the future whatever may be found to be wise.

No man knows what conditions will come from the completion of this great enterprise. It will change the currents of the world's commerce. It has practically lifted continents from their places and put them thousands of miles nearer the sources of supply and demand. New highways of trade will be evolved and new problems of tremendous import and far-reaching consequence will arise to be solved. It will be little short of folly and criminal neglect if we do not preserve for our people the right to deal with this great commercial agency and these great and important questions so far as they relate to our domestic trade as to them may seem wise. We can not excuse ourselves by shifting the responsibility to the President and accepting his word as to what is best to be done. The responsibility of legislation is ours. We can not escape it, we can not shift it, and we will be held responsible for our action by those who have intrusted us with power but who will have the opportunity in the near future to withhold that power from us and send those here who will truly represent them upon this great legislative matter.

Let us now discuss the Hay-Pauncefote treaty itself, assuming that it is applicable to the Panama Canal, and see whether by any reasonable construction we have violated its letter or spirit in passing the law we are asked to repeal.

I can not hope to present this matter so clearly or so conclusively as others have done, but I am going to try to show in my feeble way from the Hay-Pauncefote treaty itself and the circumstances surrounding it that our right to make this exemption is perfectly clear and unquestionable; in fact, that to do otherwise is discrimination against us.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty with England was entered into in 1901. To my mind there is no ambiguity in this treaty when its terms are construed in the light of the conditions surrounding its framing and acceptance and in the object to be attained.

For almost a century a canal connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific had been the dream of the maritime world. When it was deemed probable there was no thought of its being built by other than private enterprise, energy, and capital. In 1850 the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was entered into between England and the United States. I shall not go into the reasons for this treaty. They are wholly immaterial and are interesting only as matters of history. That is not the treaty to be construed, and it is to be considered only so far as it may throw light upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Under this treaty neither Great Britain nor the United States could build this canal, but they were to give their support and protection on equal terms to any third party that might build it.

Years passed. No canal was built. Every effort failed. It became evident that no canal would be built without the aid and assistance of the United States. It had even entered the minds of many that this canal, if built at all, would have to be built by the United States itself. While England's conduct had clearly nullified and made obsolete the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and while she had abandoned it—all of which has been so clearly shown by the late lamented senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Bradley] in one of the most comprehensive, eloquent, and masterly speeches ever delivered in the United States Senate—the United States did not insist upon taking a course consistent with this view, but in an orderly way proceeded to negotiate a new treaty under which it could build this canal either directly or by lending its support, credit, and assistance. England wanted the canal built. She was really more interested than anyone else. Hers would be the greatest benefit arising from its construction. It gives her a direct route to and from Australia and her island possessions. It gives her a shorter route to large world markets to which her ships will carry the products of her looms, mills, and factories. In case of war, requiring her navies to pass through the canal, she will have access to it upon equal terms with any other nation unless she should be at war with us. Her great colony to the north of us will be specially favored and her products will be given a new market in our seaport cities. More than half of the world's shipping flies her flag, her ships plow every sea and enter every harbor, and the benefit to her people and her interests is incalculable.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made in 1901. Theodore Roosevelt was President and John Hay was Secretary of State, two men whose intelligence and patriotism can not be questioned and whose approval is a guaranty that American interests and rights were fully protected and whose fame will be dimmed and patriotism slurred if this legislation is passed.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty, if applicable at all, must be construed in the light of present conditions, even if they were not contemplated when the treaty was entered into. If not it does not apply at all. As a matter of fact, there was no thought of the United States owning the territory through which the canal would pass. Provision was made for a change of sovereignty, but that evidently had reference to a change to some power other than the United States and after the canal was constructed, and had in mind the common changes of Government in the Central American countries. The territory does belong to the United States. It is the sovereign of the territory. This is conceded by England. Lord Grey says:

> Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign—

And so forth.

He also admits that the treaty must be construed in the light of this relation when he says, continuing:

> His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

This because of its subsequently acquired sovereignty.

Furthermore, this treaty must be construed upon the basis of the sovereignty and ownership of the United States of the canal and Canal Zone and the limits of the Constitution upon the treaty-making power, or else it can not apply at all. Those who insist that the treaty applies to the present conditions must do so with full knowledge of the limits upon the treaty-making power of the United States, and that Constitution, as I have already said, expressly provides that Congress—not the treaty-making power—shall have power to dispose of and make all rules and regulations affecting the property of the United States. The treaty-making power could not enter into any agreement disposing of or limiting the sovereignty of the United States in any of its then property or in any to be thereafter acquired, and it could not make any rules or regulations respecting it that would be binding legally or morally on the United States, and if any such action was or has been taken it would not become binding until ratified and carried into effect by the Congress.

Congress has expressly negatived the idea that we have disposed of or given up any of our authority and sovereignty over this canal and has asserted its authority to take such action as it deems wise over our own domestic trade. Even if it was intended that the treaty should affect our domestic trade Congress has refused to ratify that intention as it had a perfect right to do and England can not complain, because she accepted the treaty with full knowledge of the constitutional limitation.

Let us construe, then, briefly and simply the treaty affecting this canal and by which our obligations must be measured and determined in the light of the changed conditions and on the basis of our ownership and sovereignty over the canal and Canal Zone.

The preamble to this treaty is often referred to, but it is no part of the treaty in any sense whatever. It is a mere recital of what it is desired shall be accomplished by and under the treaty and does not in any way control or affect the terms or articles of the agreement, except as it may throw light upon the purposes to be accomplished. Three purposes are expressed in this preamble. The desire to facilitate the construction of a canal connecting the Atlantic and the Pacific, the removal of any objection that might arise under and by virtue of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the construction of this canal under the auspices of the United States without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and then follows the treaty by the terms of which these purposes are to be attained. This is the treaty we are to construe, and we are to gather its meaning from its terms and not from outside understandings or conditions which apply to another treaty alone.

Article 1 of the treaty, and the first agreed stipulation in it, says:

> The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

Nothing ambiguous, nothing uncertain about that. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty is abrogated, set aside, wiped out, done away with, and is not to be considered at all in determining the rights of the parties under the present treaty. Even article 8 is not excepted or carried into the present treaty, notwithstanding this is claimed by some. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty measures our rights and obligations, and not the treaty of 1850. The rights of Great Britain and other nations are to be determined by this treaty and by no other, and while a consideration of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the facts that led up to it, and its continuance or its abrogation may be of great historical interest, they do not fix or determine the obligations of the United States nor the rights of Great Britain, and much of the learned discussions that we have had is really not applicable at all.

The second article of the treaty is an agreement or stipulation binding upon both parties to the effect that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the United States either directly or indirectly and subject to the provisions of "the present treaty"—mark you, not the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—"the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JONES. I do not wish the Senator to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator does not mind if I yield to my own wishes in the matter, I hope?

Mr. JONES. I do not think I can prevent the Senator from doing so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crawford	Martin, Va.	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Dillingham	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Brady	Gallinger	Page	Sutherland
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Perkins	Thompson
Bristow	Johnson	Pittman	Thornton
Bryan	Jones	Ransdell	Tillman
Burton	Kern	Reed	Vardaman
Catron	Lane	Shafroth	Walsh
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Williams
Chilton	Lewis	Shively
Clark, Wyo.	McLean	Simmons

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS], and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the absence of the following named Senators, who are out of the city in attendance on the funeral of the late Senator from Kentucky, Mr. BRADLEY: The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] is absent on official business. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. WHITE answered to his name.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is out of the city on business of the Senate; also that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. LA FOLLETTE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. NORRIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. KERN. I move that the order directing the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators be vacated.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. WALSH submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2800) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, and 4, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 3.

T. J. WALSH,
ATLEE POMERENE,
WM. S. KENYON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. W. RUCKER.
R. F. BROUSSARD,
W. D. B. AINEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the conference report be adopted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish the Senator from Montana would explain the features of the report.

Mr. WALSH. The changes are very simple.

Amendment No. 3 need not be adverted to, because the House has receded from it.

The House inserts as amendment No. 1 the words "not heretofore made," so that the act will not apply to nominations of candidates which have been heretofore made. It appears that in one or two States nominations have already been made. It is not intended to disturb those.

The next change is a mere verbal one. The words "the case of" are taken out in line 10, page 2.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will ask the Senator whether, under the bill as it is now proposed to be passed, there is any such thing as a convention for the purpose of nominating candidates for the office?

Mr. WALSH. That is all regulated by the State statutes. If the State officers are nominated by convention, the Senators are nominated in the same way.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This bill applies only in the event of vacancies, as I understand.

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is it to apply in the case of nominations of candidates coming up regularly?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; regularly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What is the mode of procedure prescribed by the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Just that which is prescribed by the State statutes, if there are any, for the nomination and election of State officers. The United States Senators will be nominated and elected in exactly the same way.

The last amendment, numbered 4, provides:

That this act shall expire by limitation at the end of three years from the date of its approval.

There would seem to be no particular reason for this amendment, but it was insisted upon by some Members of the House; and for the purpose of expediting the passage of the act the Senate conferees decided to acquiesce in that insistence, believing that the act will have subserved its purpose within the time mentioned, anyway.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, section 1 of this bill is clearly permanent in its character. It reads:

That at the regular election held in any State next preceding the expiration of the term for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress, at which election a Representative to Congress is regularly by law to be chosen, a United States Senator from said State shall be elected by the people for the term commencing on the 4th day of March next thereafter.

We have a provision in the law with reference to the election of Members of the House of Representatives which fixes a uniform time for the holding of elections, and of course there ought to be a law of the United States fixing a uniform time for the election of Senators, and I can not understand upon what theory the fourth amendment proposed by the House should have been accepted. It applies to the entire act:

SEC. 3. That this act shall expire by limitation at the end of three years from the date of its approval.

I would have no objection if that were limited to what follows section 1. Section 1 is permanent, and if it should expire at the end of three years, that section or something like it ought to be reenacted by Congress.

Mr. WALSH. The suggestion made by the Senator from Utah is entirely pertinent and the observation quite appropriate. The Senator knows the character of opposition which was made to the bill in this body. It was likely to be asserted with such vigor in the other branch that the passage of the bill would be imperiled, and the conferees felt that it would be wiser that we should accede to what seemed to be the necessities of the case and secure a speedy passage of the act, depending upon future legislation to take care of the point to which the Senator adverts. Of course, the first section is permanent in its character, and some legislation of that kind ought to be in force, but I apprehend that there will be no difficulty in taking care of that when the time comes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Can the Senator tell us whether, if the Senate should disagree to the fourth amendment and send the bill back to conference, there would be any likelihood of the House conferees receding?

Mr. WALSH. I dare say we might propose an amendment to it to the effect that the provisions of section 2 only should so expire, in the hope that that perhaps would be acceptable, but the conferees did not think it advisable to delay the matter.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest that the consideration of this conference report is likely to take some little time, and I think it would be better that it should go over. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is very anxious to take the floor and proceed with his speech.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think it will take only a moment longer. I suggest to the Senator from Montana that it is quite worth the while to send the bill back to conference with the understanding that the Senate will accept an amendment modified as the Senator suggests; that is, making it apply to the portion of the bill following section 1.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Utah really feels that we ought to make the effort. I shall be very glad to have the Senate conferees undertake to accomplish the change, although my own idea about it is that we had better accept the conference report as it stands and take care of the situation at a later time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I hope the Senator from Montana will not do that, because the first section is permanent, as the Senator himself thinks. We ought to deal with it now rather than postpone it to a time at the end of three years. Unless the Senator from Montana objects. I will move that the Senate further insist upon its disagreement to the fourth amendment and request a further conference.

Mr. WALSH. With instructions to endeavor to limit the effect of amendment 4 to section 2?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Very well; I will be glad to have the bill go back to conference and make a further effort.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana withdraws his motion for the adoption of the conference report and the Senator from Utah submits a motion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move that the Senate disagree to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill; further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the House; ask a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. STONE. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee having this matter in charge if there is likelihood of much delay in the further conference? It is very important that the bill should be disposed of at this session.

Mr. WALSH. I may say to the Senator from Missouri that I hope to be able to submit a further report by to-morrow.

Mr. STONE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Utah.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WALSH, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. KENYON conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. JONES. The provision which I have just read fixes the status of the United States. It takes it apart from the other nations of the earth and places it in a position by itself. It establishes its status as the owner of the canal, and this article also eliminates Great Britain entirely from any connection with the canal that is to be constructed under this treaty. She has no control over it, no obligation toward it, no liability for its protection, operation, maintenance, or use. If the United States should construct such canal directly, she would be the owner of it and should enjoy all the rights incident to such ownership, and her right to provide for its regulation and management was made exclusive. If rights incident to ownership did not mean that she could use it as an owner and treat her own in its use as she pleased, what does it mean? What sort of ownership is that which gives you no rights of ownership?

The only other article in the treaty which is of the nature of an agreement between the parties is article 4, by which—

> It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

Note that the general principle of neutralization referred to in this article does not make mention of the principle of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but seems to refer to the general principle of neutralization as generally understood in international law, and it is also significant that care is taken to confine the application to the obligations under "the present treaty."

These are substantially all of the terms of the treaty involving the two parties to it. The remaining article is not in the nature of an agreement between the two parties, but it is a statement upon the part of one of them, the owner of the canal, as to how the canal shall be managed and used; it is a statement of the rules adopted solely by one of the parties, the owner, for the use of the canal by all nations that would observe such rules. It provides for the neutralization of the canal and its use so as not to impair the "general principle" referred to in the preamble and embodied in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and, when construed as I construe it, does exactly what that article provided for; and for the purpose of comparison and as aiding in a clear understanding of this article 3, I give here briefly the provisions of said article 8.

ARTICLE 8.

> The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulation, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

Under this article Great Britain and the United States agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulation to any other practicable communications by canal or railway across Central America. As a consideration for their joint protection the parties owning or constructing the canal or railway should impose no charges except those approved as just and reasonable by them. The canals or railways were to be open on equal terms to citizens of Great Britain and the United States because both Governments were under equal obligations toward the owners of such canals or railways, and this is an important point to remember. The canals and railways were also to be open to the citizens of other countries upon the same terms as to the citizens of Great Britain and the United States if such countries were willing to grant equal protection to such canals or railways. In other words, equal rights and privileges in any such canal or railway were accorded to all who incurred equal obligations. The general principle of article 8 and all through the Clayton-Bulwer treaty affecting the use of any canal or railway that might be constructed under it was that equal treatment went with equal obligation. That is provided for in article 3 of the present treaty, and that "general principle" is carried out only by permitting the exemption which it is sought to repeal. Nowhere in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is there any limitation on the owner and builder of the canal. He is free to act as he sees fit. He could treat his own ships as he desired. The only restriction was that those nations giving aid and affording protection would insist on equal treatment, the one with the other, and that the charges to them should be just and reasonable.

We are now prepared to interpret article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in the light of conditions as they exist and the terms of this treaty as they are. Private ownership in the canal is out of consideration. The United States is the party that has built it. The United States is the sole and undisputed owner not only of the canal but of the territory through which it passes. Neither Great Britain nor any other power has or can have any control over the canal or of the charges for its use. Neither Great Britain nor any other power is or can be under any obligation toward the canal. In fact, England insisted that she should be free from all responsibility. It must be protected, maintained, operated, controlled, and managed by the United States alone. Under the "general principle" of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty only the nations affording protection to the canal secured any special rights. Therefore the nations now under no obligations and affording no protection are entitled to no special consideration. Under that "general principle," if no protection was afforded the owner, he could treat all nations alike, because all were on the same basis. He could use his property as he saw fit.

If Nicaragua had built the canal and Great Britain and the United States had given it their protection under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, would anyone contend that Nicaragua could not treat her own ships as she saw fit? Surely not. The United States has stepped into the place of Nicaragua, and if section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is brought into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it does not apply to the owner of the territory through which the canal passes, and Great Britain's concession that our ownership changes the status as to five of the rules surely concedes also the other one, even though it may work to the injury of some British interest.

It is strange that Great Britain concedes everything that can be conceded without doing her or her interests any harm, and that she insists upon everyting that is of benefit to her no matter how injurious to the United States, and it is stranger still that there are those who hunt for reasons to sustain her claims and refute our own. The United States purchased the rights of the French company for $40,000,000, acquired the land from Panama for $10,000,000 and a large annual payment, and has spent $400,000,000 in the construction of the canal. She will spend millions for its fortification in order to protect it against all nations, including herself, if the construction our friends give to the treaty is correct. She must maintain, operate, and defend it, and bear every obligation and discharge every responsibility toward it through all time. No other nation has done a thing toward it or will do a thing except use it. The United States must pay $15,000,000 or more a year for its maintenance, and if the charges collected for the service rendered do not pay this, it will be her loss and the loss of the people of the United States. Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty there were no restrictions and no limitations on the owner of the canal. He could use it as he pleased. If he had the protection and support of Great Britain and the United States, they expected equal treatment, not the treatment the owner might accord to himself or his own ships or the ships of his citizens, but equal treatment between themselves and reasonable charges, and only other nations assuming equal obligations were to have equal treatment. Now, the United States being in a position never contemplated by either of these treaties, being the owner of the canal and the territory through which it passes, has all the rights and privileges of the owner under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and is under no obligations other than to extend to all nations using her canal and observing the rules which she herself has prescribed, in order to secure equal treatment and reasonable charges in and for the use of a canal toward which they have not contributed a cent, and toward which they are under no obligation to afford any protection. Under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the nations getting benefits had to bear expense and obligations; here they get the benefits without any expense or obligation, and yet they complain.

England's whole course in connection with this canal has been outrageous, despicable, and dishonorable. She had no just claim in the first instance as a basis for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. She violated and utterly disregarded that treaty when made, and it should have been abrogated long ago. Now, regardless of the changed conditions, she has the effrontery to claim that while the fact of sovereignty does not relieve us from the obligation and expense of protecting the canal it does release us from the observance of the five rules, but does not release us from the first one, under which her benefits are the same and our position made more humiliating and helpless. It is all right for the change of ownership to relieve her in the case of the Suez Canal, but it is a breach of faith to insist that a like change shall relieve us. She is an adept in the art of diplomatic bluffing, and it looks as if she were going to win out with us. She does not care what her reputation for generosity is so long as she can reap commercial advantage and promote her shipping interests. Insistence for her citizens of every claim they make does not make an outcast of England, but increases her influence and commands respect. Neither Great Britain nor any other nation can afford or is under any obligation to afford any protection to this canal, and therefore the United States is acting exactly within this "general principle" when it affords its own citizens the use of this canal on such terms as it sees fit and gives to the citizens of all other nations equal treatment, the one with the other. Furthermore, as the owner of the canal, there is no limitation on its power to treat with its own under the "general principle" referred to.

Under the treaty itself and under the existing conditions the United States stands in front of its canal upon its own territory facing the nations of the world and says to them, "Here is my canal, built by me in my own territory. I will maintain, operate, and protect it. You are under no obligations toward it. You have no responsibility for its protection and are put to no expense for its construction. I shall treat you all alike in its use, and to insure equal treatment I am going to adopt certain rules to govern its use by all those observing such rules. If you want to use it, observe these rules or stay out." This is the viewpoint from which article 3 must be interpreted, and when so interpreted it is reasonable and clear, and every provision and rule of it can be given its literal meaning.

Article 3 starts out as follows, and this is always omitted by those who are contending that we have dishonored ourselves by deliberately violating the "plain" terms of our treaty; and yet no correct interpretation can be given by omitting these words and giving them due consideration:

> The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules.

That is to say, the United States adopts the rules, not the United States and Great Britain, but the United States alone, the owner of the canal. These rules are to be looked to entirely for the neutralization and the carrying out of the "general principle" referred to in the preamble. We do not go to article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to determine what to do, but these rules contained in "the present treaty" control and guide us.

This rule fixes the status of other nations; and as article 2 fixed the status of the United States, takes her from among the other nations of the earth, and places her in a position by herself, so article 3 fixes the status of the other nations of the earth and puts them in a class by themselves as the users of the canal under certain rules which they must observe which have been made and fixed and promulgated by the owner of the canal.

They square exactly with said article 8 only when construed as we construe them. Here is the first rule adopted by the United States governing the use of its property:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

This is the rule which we are charged with violating. What is the basis for this charge? The words "all nations" are quoted, and we are asked, "Do they not include the United States?" and the answer is, "Of course they do." And this is the means by which the people are deceived and by which they are led to believe that their nation has dishonored itself. I received a letter a few days ago from a good citizen of my State, and a most intelligent one, in which he said:

> There is really no doubt about the meaning of the treaty. It is very plain English. If treaties are made to be carried out, let us carry out this one. Do not let the honor of the United States be touched by saving a few dollars. We gave our word to pay off the money borrowed during the Revolution. We did so. Let us maintain the same standard.

I venture to say that he had not read all this rule. He had read some statement or editorial saying that rule 1 of article 3 said the vessels of "all nations" should pay just and equitable charges and, of course, he could not understand how these words would not include the United States.

In fact, he sent me, along with his letter, a clipping from a paper quoting an editorial from the St. Louis Republic. This editorial illustrates the method pursued by many of those who advocate the repeal of this law. The editorial starts out in this way:

> Nothing could be simpler than this canal-tolls question. Here is what we promised:
> "The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

The trouble with this quotation is that it is not correct. There has been left out the important clause "observing these rules." This editorial goes on to say we need no diplomatic correspondence, we do not need any international lawyers, we do not need any outside interpretation to determine what this provision means; yet in this very quotation it leaves out one of the very important provisions of the rule and thereby changes the very meaning of it. Was the editor of the Republic ignorant of this important clause, or did he omit it deliberately?

I have here also, bearing on the same method of presenting the matter to the people, and showing why it is that the people are really deceived in regard to this matter, an editorial from the Boston Herald, in which it says, after suggesting that there is a strong sentiment in favor of exempting our own ships:

> How can this preference be given? The readiest answer is, Simply put no tolls on American ships; pass them through free, and levy charges only on the foreigners. From this easy expedient the United States is debarred by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which provides that the canal shall be "free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations," "on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

Leaving out again the important phrase, the qualifying clause, "observing these rules."

The rule is not made for the United States; it is made by the United States. It is made not to govern it in the use of its canal, but to govern it in its treatment of other nations in their use of the canal. The canal is not open and free to the vessels of all nations, but it is free and open to the "vessels of all nations observing these rules." It is absurd to suppose that the United States would make rules to govern itself in the use of its own. It could use its own as it saw fit. It would be subject to no rules of its own making. It could use its own one day in one way and the next day in some other way. It could charge its citizens one rate one day and another rate the next, and no one could prevent it. If this rule applies to the United States, suppose it should violate it? What punishment would it inflict upon itself? Would it exclude its ships from the use of the canal? If so, for how long? Suppose it should persist in violating this rule, would it declare war against itself and send one fleet out against the other? Suppose it provides that its coastwise ships shall pay $1.25 a ton on going through the canal and that its ships in the foreign trade shall pay $5 per ton on going through, what steps would it take to prevent such manifest inequality? It is absolutely and ridiculously absurd to say that this rule was made for the United States by the United States, and, if possible, it is more manifestly absurd as we examine and analyze further the terms of this rule.

In this connection I want to call attention to a suggestion that has come to me from one of my correspondents. He says:

> Under this article the United States adopts certain rules that are to be observed by other countries. How is the United States going to ascertain whether other countries are going to observe the rules or not? Is it going to wait until some exigency arises where the rule is actually violated or not violated, observed or not observed, or is the United States going to prescribe some way by which nations, before they begin the use of this canal, shall indicate to the United States that they expect to observe these rules?

Now, that is a reasonable suggestion. It seems to me that it will be reasonable and proper and necessary that the United States shall say to the nations of the earth, "Those of you that signify in a certain way that you are going to observe these rules may pass through the canal on certain conditions."

Now, if the United States does that, will it be required to go through the idle formality of notifying itself that it expects to observe rules that it has made for the use of its own canal?

What is the purpose of this particular rule? It is to carry out the "general principle" mentioned in the preamble; that is, to insure that all nations with equal responsibilities shall have equal treatment. This, as I have said, exempts the United States from its operation, because the entire burden is on the United States. The rule is made for all those nations who have no burdens in connection with the canal.

The canal is to be free and open to what? To the "vessels of commerce." These words, standing alone and taken in their literal meaning, would, of course, include vessels in the domestic or coastwise trade as well as vessels in the foreign trade, but when used in a treaty must be understood to refer to commerce between the two countries and as dealing with foreign relations and foreign trade alone. Each nation would be presumed to reserve to itself, as they always have done, the regulation of its domestic trade, and unless it should be otherwise expressly provided it must be presumed that this expression referred entirely to vessels of foreign commerce. This is common sense. This has been the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen against Smith, in One hundred and ninety-fifth Supreme Court Reports, so often quoted in this debate. The court says:

> Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port, the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, providing that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States." Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply, without discrimination, to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

It is attempted to avoid the force of this decision by suggesting for the first time that trade from port to port through the canal is not coastwise trade, on account of the distance necessary to go. The statute defining coastwise trade does not limit it by distance, but declares that trade from port to port is coastwise trade. That was the law at the time of the treaty. That was fully understood by all. Only the extreme exigencies of the case developed this idea in the great mind of the honored Senator from New York, and it simply illustrates the straits to which our friends who advocate this repeal are reduced in finding something to support and justify their position.

This has been the holding of Great Britain itself for more than three-quarters of a century. Letters are read from Mr. Choate and Mr. White stating that it was understood that coastwise as well as other vessels were included, but they do not say that the matter was discussed at all, and surely our representatives in making this treaty would not abandon or overturn a domestic policy that we had followed since the foundation of the Government without some discussion. To assume any such action would impute to them grave, even criminal, neglect of the interests of their country, and it is a humiliating confession that they make now. How or why did they have such understanding if it was not discussed at all? and it certainly was not discussed, or they would say so. "Vessels of commerce and war." Vessels of war mean battleships, cruisers, torpedo boats, and so forth, the property of the Nation itself, its instrument of defense and of offense, and not the property of individuals. They are put on exactly the same basis as vessels of commerce, and no amount of quibbling can construe it otherwise. Whose "vessels of commerce and war"? All nations'? No; but the vessels of commerce and war of "all nations observing these rules." These last three words are often omitted by those who insist that the United States is bound by this rule. Why are they omitted? Through ignorance, carelessness, or for the deliberate purpose of deception? They are essential to a correct understanding of the rule. They show that the United States is not included, because it would be senseless for the United States to require itself to observe any rules adopted by itself for the use of its own property. It can use its own as it sees fit, and needs no rules to govern it in the use of its own. No owner ever makes rules for the government of himself in the use of his own. It would be a stupid thing to do. He could change any rule that did not suit at any time.

If John Smith should put up a sign on a gate to a road through his farm saying "all persons paying 25 cents may pass through here," would anyone be so simple or so foolish, if you please, as to contend that John Smith would have to pay that sum whenever he used the road? Of course not. If the editor of the Washington Herald would declare that "all persons reading my paper shall pay 1 cent," would he contend that when he took a copy from the press that he would have to pay himself a penny? And so when the owner of property prescribes rules for its use those rules are never understood as applying to himself, but to others, and there is no reason in following a different rule of construction here. If we do follow a different rule, it leads to improbable, absurd, ridiculous, indefensible, and preposterous results. A battleship is a vessel of war and must pay tolls just the same as a vessel of commerce; and if we charge tolls on a battleship of England, then if this rule applies to the owner of the canal, to the United States, the maker of the rules, we must pay to ourselves tolls on our battleship when it goes through. What can be more absurd? It is so absurd that our friends on the other side, some of them, say it is foolish to contend that we must pay for our battleships. If the rule does not apply in one instance to the United States, how or with what reason can you say that it applies in another? When you make this concession you concede the whole contention. Vessels of commerce and vessels of war are treated exactly alike if language means anything at all. Is it conceivable that the Government of the United States has been guilty of such monumental folly as to purchase territory and build in it a canal at a cost of $400,000,000, and then can not use it for its own vessels, its own warships, without the payment of tolls? To confess this is to confess our inability to protect our own interests and to show that we need a guardian to protect us from our own stupidity. But this is not all. This rule provides that these vessels shall use the canal "on terms of entire equality, so"—note this—"that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic"—again note this—"or otherwise." If "such nation" includes the United States, then if you charge its vessels tolls there is a discrimination against it, because it will not only have to pay the same tolls as other nations, but it has all the burdens and responsibilities of protecting and defending the canal from which other nations are free. In other words, this rule is violated if tolls are charged the United States.

Again, it also provides that there shall be no discrimination against the citizens or subjects of such nation in any way. This provision is violated if you impose tolls upon the vessels of the citizens of the United States, because they have furnished the money for the building of the canal, and they must furnish the money to protect and defend it; and if, in addition to this, they must pay the same tolls as other people, they must bear a greater burden than the people of any other nation. Thus it is that to apply this rule to the United States makes it absolutely ridiculous, indefensible, and wholly unenforceable, while to take it in a reasonable way, as a rule prescribed by the owner of a great property to govern its use by all nations observing it, brings about absolute equality of treatment to such nations and fulfills to the letter that "general principle" which permeated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and which it is declared in the preamble to this treaty is not to be impaired, and which would be impaired by any other construction. I assert most positively that only by exempting the United States from the observance of these rules do you comply with the "general principle" of equality which is insisted upon. "The charges must be just and reasonable." Does this apply to the United States, to the owner? Is it possible that the United States must protect itself against itself? Why would it impose upon itself unjust and inequitable charges?

The remaining five rules clearly relate to the neutralization of the canal, and by no twisted reasoning can be made to apply to the United States; and yet, if anyone insists that rule 1 applies to the United States, they can not avoid the consequences of applying the other rules to the United States. All the rules are in one article and must be applied alike or the whole treaty fails.

Rule 2 says that the canal shall never be blockaded, and so forth. No nation ever blockades its own ports, and why should the United States say that it shall never blockade its own property? Suppose it should do so, would it send out another fleet to drive away the blockading fleet in order that the Nation might keep faith with itself and observe this rule? You say, "How absurd!" And yet you can not escape the absurdity if you contend that the rule applies to the United States; and if you say it does not, then you must admit that none of the rules apply to the United States.

Under rule 3, if we are at war with another power, if the rule applies to us, as it surely does not, any war vessel of ours in the canal, in addition to paying tolls under rule 1, could not take on any more provisions or stores than might be strictly necessary and it would have to hasten through just as rapidly as possible. No matter if we are in our own territory, under our own flag, and within our own sovereignty, we must hurry through and go out upon the high seas as if the canal and territory about it were alien country. Is it possible to take a position more disgracefully humiliating than this? And yet this must be the position of those who insist that these rules apply to the United States. Is not this giving up a sovereign right to say that our own ships can not stay within the limits of our own territory as long as we want them to?

Again, if we are at war, we can not under rule 4, if it applies to us, embark or land troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance, and then we must proceed on our way as rapidly as possible. It is idle to suppose that a self-respecting people will tolerate such a construction when they are fully advised. We can not stop in our own canal; we can not land our troops on our own soil! The people of this country will never assent to such a contention.

But these are not all the humiliating things we are required to do by those who include the United States in "all nations." Rule 5 says that its provisions shall apply to the waters within 3 marine leagues of either end of the canal, and if we are at war our battleships shall not stay in these waters for more than 24 hours at any one time, but we must hoist anchor and leave our own territory. If a battleship of our enemy has left we can not follow for 24 hours. If an enemy's fleet is out in front and one of our warships has arrived it must hasten on through and go out of its own territory and away from its own flag to certain destruction. The application of these rules to the United States would place us in a humiliating, cowardly, pusillanimous, and intolerable situation.

Rule 6 is absolutely silly and asinine as applied to the United States, and would be a fit product only of a lunatic asylum. It would prohibit us if at war from attacking or injuring the canal or any of the works in connection with it. If any rule is needed to prevent us from attacking and injuring our own property, then, indeed, the sooner we turn our affairs over to England or some other power the better it will be for us, if not for mankind. These last five rules are so manifestly absurd when applied to the United States and lead to such ridiculous conclusions that it is generally conceded that they do not apply to the United States because of her ownership and sovereignty, but when this is conceded rule 1 falls, because it is a universal rule of treaty construction that if a part falls it all falls.

Mr. President, I have analyzed this treaty from the standpoint of present conditions and the present situation. I do not question the judgment, ability, sincerity, integrity, or patriotism of those who do not agree with my construction when I say that to my mind any construction that requires us to charge tolls on our vessels on going through this canal is senseless, absurd, foolish, unpatriotic, and un-American, and in "plain contravention" of the terms of the treaty itself. When I say that I simply express but feebly how it appears to me. However, we do not need to depend upon our construction to defend our action. Great Britain herself, through her representative, has practically admitted that we have the right under the treaty to do what we have done when he says in the letter of A. Mitchell Innes, under date of July 8, 1912:

> As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

Why need we quibble and finesse to find some way to show that we have violated a treaty when the other party practically admits that we have not and that we are within our rights in what we have done? We have by law confined this exemption to our coastwise vessels only, and it will be time enough for Great Britain to complain when that law is violated and the vessels exempted are not confining themselves strictly to the coastwise trade. I think the suggestion that we would not enforce our laws was an actual and gratuitous insult, and it should have been resented. It should not be overlooked that the distinction regarding the coastwise trade made by the learned Senator from New York never occurred to the British representatives. If it had, they would surely have suggested it.

Mr. President, I want to call attention at this point to what appears to me to be the real situation with reference to the contention of Great Britain. They have practically admitted in their note to this Government that if we confined our exemptions strictly to the coastwise trade, they could make no objection. If we do that, they have no cause of complaint; if we fail to do it, then arises any cause of complaint they may have which could then be submitted to any tribunal that the two Governments might agree upon or to the court, or in some other way than by our absolutely repealing the law which they in effect concede, if we confine it to this strict purpose, we had a perfect right to pass. Why are we falling over ourselves to undo something which in fact they admit we had a right to do, but which they fear we may not really carry out.

Mr. President, we have the right to do what we have done. No contract has been broken, no obligation violated. The Nation's honor has not been impaired. Its sovereignty has been upheld and its rights maintained. To repeal this law now and under the circumstances is to confess ourselves dishonored in the eyes of the world and cowardly. Did we think we were right when we made this exemption? Surely. Did we not then consider everything that is presented now? What new light has been thrown upon any point? Why do Senators confess by their votes now that they voted ignorantly then or deliberately dishonored their country and their people? Both votes can not be right. The people will demand an explanation. It is noble to confess a fault and repair a wrong; it is ignoble to admit a fault when faultless or to surrender a right through fear. Good will purchased through humiliating concessions is not lasting and will soon be followed by contempt and aggression.

The President asks us to do "the large thing" by granting the demands of England whether "right or wrong." That course would dishonor the Nation, humiliate our people, barter our sovereignty, and bring upon us the just contempt of the world. I know the President meant well, but neither men nor nations can act on that theory and maintain their own self-respect or the respect of others. A firm and just insistence by the Nation upon its rights will cultivate good will, command esteem, and promote peace.

But we are doing "the large thing" by England and the world now. We are doing more for her and more for the nations of the earth than any people have done for others since the "morning stars sang together." We have completed the most stupendous work since the world's creation at tremendous cost in money, toil, and human life. We are going to protect and maintain it and permit the nations of the earth to use it without asking them to repay the cost of its construction. In fixing the charges for its use we take into account our coastwise trade going through it and fix the charge on foreign ships upon exactly the same basis as if we charged such ships for going through. We do not expect for many years to receive from the charges fixed the cost of operation and maintenance. Whatever we do not receive is simply a gift to them. Then we further do "the large thing." We do not exempt our ships in the foreign trade, as we have a perfect right to do and as we ought to do, but we charge them exactly the same rate that we charge to other ships. England should be the last nation on earth to complain at our action in exempting our coastwise ships. She will get the great, the large benefits from this canal.

Her ships will reap the benefit of this great work, and that she is complaining now and insisting upon more favors shows how tenaciously and persistently she looks after the rights and interests of her citizens. While I am amazed at her effrontery, I can not help but admire her devotion to the complaints and demands of her subjects. Yes; we are now doing "the large thing" in heaping measure and neither honor nor right call upon us to do more.

Does the President think that if we grant this demand it will end England's claims? Surely not; and yet I fear he does. If so, he is greatly mistaken. She has given us fair warning, and I want the people of the country to know what to expect if this humiliating surrender is completed. They will then know how to gauge the devotion of their selected representatives to their welfare and interests. Sir Edward Grey, in his note of November 14, 1912, says:

> Animated by an earnest desire to avoid points which might in any way prove embarrassing to the United States, His Majesty's Government have confined their objections within the narrowest possible limits.

What points has England not presented that would embarrass us? How considerate! What magnanimity! Objections confined to the narrowest limits! Grant this demand, and we may expect another. What is our wise course? Stand upon our just rights, and let her other demands be presented for such consideration as they deserve, unembarrassed by the concession of this unjust demand.

There is another instance of England interpreting a provision in her own interests that is enlightening, in view of the contention by her and her friends regarding the treaty under consideration. In the Panama Canal act there is a provision under which railroad and trust owned and controlled ships can not use the Panama Canal. That provision was inserted to insure the use of this great waterway in the interest of the people, and on the assumption that we could do so not only because we had a right to as the owner of the canal, but also because it was a provision without discrimination, and a just and proper restriction. What does England say about this provision? In the letter of Sir Edward Grey, he says:

> His Majesty's Government do not read this section of the act as applying to or affecting British ships, and they therefore do not feel justified in making any observations upon it. They assume that it applies only to vessels flying the flag of the United States, and that it is aimed at practices which concern only the internal trade of the United States.

Note that they concede that railroad-owned ships may pass through the canal in the internal trade of the United States, notwithstanding the view of the Senator from New York. It never occurred to them that railroad-owned ships passing from one port on the Atlantic to another port on the Pacific were not engaged in the coastwise trade, and they concede that we can prohibit our railroad-owned ships from going through the canal from one port to another on the ground that it affects internal trade. If we can prohibit ships from passing through the canal because it relates to an internal matter, then we can permit them to go through upon any terms that we may deem wise, just, and proper.

Legislation that prevents the use of the canal by American ships is not objected to because it relates to the internal trade of the United States, but legislation relieving our ships from some burdens, even though affecting only our internal trade, is objected to if by any possibility English ships, by reason of their geographical location and situation, may be at a disadvantage. But this is not all, and here is the secret to this whole trouble and the activity of England: "If this view is mistaken and the provisions are intended to apply under any circumstances to British vessels, they must reserve their right to examine the matter further and to raise such contentions as may seem justified." No suggestion of giving up anything to get a reputation for generosity. That is not England's way. In other words, England contends that we have the power to exclude our own railroad, trust controlled ships from our canal, but Canadian Pacific Railroad owned ships—that is what "under any circumstances" means—must be permitted to use the same. If we repeal our toll-exemption law and thereby admit the control of England over our own canal, she will then insist upon the ships of the Canadian Pacific Railroad being permitted to go through, and we can not help ourselves, because, "right or wrong," we will have to grant the request in order to do "the large thing" and to preserve "our reputation for generosity." Then our own transcontinental railroads will come to Congress and say, "Is it fair, is it just, is it American fair play to exclude us from the use of our own canal and permit our foreign rivals to use it?" What answer can be made to such a plea? Talk about "insidious lobbies"! In deep and devious ways it has hidden itself behind the representatives of Great Britain, and our honest, patriotic President, unfamiliar with the mainsprings of England's diplomacy, has failed to discover it, and has been unwittingly led into a course that is wholly unjustifiable and un-American and which will lead to the sacrifice of American interests and American sovereignty. The American people were much gratified at the action of the last administration in insuring the use of this canal for the benefit of the people, and they will surely hold to a strict account any administration that turns it over to the use and control of the railroads, and especially without a struggle. That is what repeal means now. That is the real issue. That is what England is after, and that is what the American people will not permit when they have a chance to express themselves upon it.

We are told by some who ought to know better that the ships that would be benefited by this exemption are railroad or trust owned ships, and this is urged as a reason for its repeal. The Commercial Appeal, of Memphis, says, referring to our coastwise law:

> Under this privilege the seacoast ships long ago formed themselves into a trust and became part of the railroad transportation system. It will be seen that more than 90 per cent of the tonnage of the seacoast ships that would benefit by free tolls through the canal either belong to the railroads or are in a shipping consolidation.

The editor of this paper—and this editorial is quoted with apparent favor by others—either deliberately tries to deceive his reading public or else he is woefully ignorant. If he had read the law signed by a Republican President, he would find that these very ships, ships owned by the railroads and ships owned or controlled by a trust, not only can not use the canal free but they can not use it at all. If the contention of Great Britain, which is really the contention of the railroad-owned ships, is sustained, this class of ships will use the canal and it will not make any difference to them what the tolls are; they will be powerful enough not only to throttle all competition but they will simply pass on to the public whatever tolls they have to pay, and the very thing this editor condemns will come about by the policy he advocates. Furthermore, if Canada's railroad-owned ships go through the canal and we exclude our own, then we violate the rule we have laid down by discriminating against our own ships and our own citizens. What are we going to do about it? Is it possible that we can not exclude our own railroad and trust owned ships from our own canal if we want to do it and think it best? Is it possible that we have bargained away that right? If you repeal this law, you can not consistently shut them out without violating rule 1. These ships belong to our citizens. If rule 1 applies to us, we can not exclude them, because that would be discrimination.

I contend that rule 1, as I say, does not apply to us, and that we can shut out our own railroad-owned and trust-controlled ships. Is it possible this argument is presented, this movement inaugurated, by the wise, sagacious, keen minds behind the railroads for the very purpose of putting us into a position where they can say to us, by and by, "You have decided that rule 1 applies to you and your own citizens, therefore you can not shut us out, because that would be a discrimination against us and your own citizens and your own interests"? There would be no answer to such a suggestion if we decide that rule 1 applies to us.

It is urged that as all the people have contributed to the construction of the canal those directly using it should contribute toward its maintenance. That would be true if they would eventually bear the burden, unless a greater benefit is received by allowing them to pass through free. To determine this we should not lose sight of one of the great purposes of this canal. The people desired to build this canal not for glory but for benefits. They feel that it is a great defensive agency in time of war and a great protective agency in time of peace—a protection against extortion by the railroads. You read the debates in Congress from the beginning of the agitation for the building of this canal and you will find that it was urged as a competitor of the railroads in the interest of the people, and you will find it charged from time to time that the greatest agency in opposition to the building of any canal was the railroads. Why? Because they knew that a free and untrammeled waterway would be a sure and efficient regulator of transcontinental rates and insure to the people reasonable charges not only in the canal but over the railroads for the transportation of their products and goods. They opposed it, they delayed it, they put it off on one excuse and another just as long as possible. It was finally entered upon, and the people began to feel that they were going to have water competition to perfect and complete the imperfect regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It began to appear as if the railroads had lost out, but they are resourceful. They are powerful. They have the best and the keenest minds in the country to advise and direct. Finding they could not prevent the building of the canal and threatened with being prohibited from using it in such a way as to throttle competition, they opposed by every means in their power the legislation prohibiting railroad-owned ships from using it. The proposition for no toll charge was pending at the same time, but this did not worry them. There was no talk of subsidy then. They bent every energy to defeat Congress in its attempt to preserve the canal for independent competition. They failed. Then they directed their efforts toward placing every burden upon the use of the canal they could. They wanted to weaken it; to destroy its efficiency.

They know that every burden placed upon it diminishes its effectiveness as a competitor just to that extent. They know that every charge placed upon the shipping using the canal diminishes its competitive power to that extent and allows them to keep their rates at a higher level. So the plausible argument is presented that as the whole people have paid for the canal those who use it should contribute to the Treasury for its maintenance. This sounds well, but how will it work? These ships will pay the tolls to the Government, of course. Then what will they do? They will charge them up as operating expenses and collect from their customers, and their customers will collect from their customers, the people, and the people who were to receive such wonderful benefits pay the bill. Water transportation rates are kept up by just the amount of the tolls, because they are an absolutely fixed and definite charge for all. Do not the people pay the labor charge, the operating expenses? Surely. Then how do they hope to escape a charge for tolls? Surely there is no magic in the word "tolls" by which they escape. This is not all. Not only do those who transport by water pay more by reason of the tolls, but those who transport by the railroads also have to pay more, and where $1 goes into the Treasury for the relief of the people $3 are taken from their pockets in increased transportation charges. In other words, when you charge tolls to avoid giving ships a subsidy you give a far greater subsidy to the railroads. It is said, however, that these tolls will be paid out of the profits. There are no profits until operating expenses and fixed charges are paid. They will no more be taken out of the profits than will the wages of the sailors. If a vessel owner taking his ship from Seattle to New York has to pay $19,000 on passing through the canal, is there anyone so simple as to think that he will not include that sum in the fixing of his rates? Of course he will, because every other ship has to do the same thing. This plea to get money from these ships for the Treasury will result in taking it from the people and in further mulcting them by higher railroad rates. Of course, the railroads want that. We are here to look after the interest of the people. To impose tolls is not in the people's interest even if any considerable number think so, and their ultimate interest should be our highest aim.

What will be the result if we do not charge tolls? What benefits will accrue? We will get lower water rates and, in my judgment, lower and more steady rail rates. Of course the ships that use the canal will get all they can. That is natural. If there are not enough to do the business their rates will be high. This will attract others. New and more ships will be built, and with more ships will come lower rates, just as have come more railroads and lower rates. Ships will more surely come, however, because there is a track free for all, and it is inevitable that the charges will be brought down to a basis of fair profit after deducting the fixed charges, and those rates must be lower less the fixed charges. This, it seems to me, is in accord with common sense and business experience.

This exemption is objected to because our coastwise ships have a monopoly of the coastwise trade. They have, and they have had it from the foundation of the Government, and we have given it to them because we have thought it the best and the wisest policy and of the greatest benefit to the people. I believe in it. It has given to us the only merchant marine that we have, and it is the only policy that will keep that merchant marine for us. It has a monopoly of that trade, but that trade is so great that it will sustain such a large merchant marine that the competition within it is or would be sufficient to keep the rates down if the shipping can be kept out of control of the railroads. We placed a provision in the canal act under which power is given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to destroy this control, and I hope that it will be done. If this shipping is in a combination we have a law under which it can be dissolved. Unless you are prepared to abandon our coastwise policy, then you can not oppose this exemption, because that policy should be uniform throughout all of our coastwise trade. If the trade between New York and Galveston is to be confined to coastwise ships and permitted to enter harbors which we have improved and pass through canals which we have constructed without the payment of tolls, why may not the ships carrying the coastwise trade between Galveston and San Diego, San Francisco, Tacoma, and Seattle enter our harbors and pass through our canals free of tolls?

We of the Pacific coast have thought that we are a part of the United States. We have been doing our part toward the maintenance of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal that the products of Iowa, Minnesota, the Dakotas, Illinois, and Missouri might have the great benefit of water transportation to the markets on the Atlantic. We have not urged that you should pay tolls. Do you think it fair that you should have this benefit from a canal built with the money of all the people and then deny to us the benefits of a free canal for our trade and our products? You can not afford to do it even if you have the power to do it. This Government rests upon justice and fair treatment, and injustice and unfairness will not long be tolerated. You can not maintain a coastwise policy that applies in one way to one section of the country and in another way to another section.

Some say that free tolls is not of general benefit, but affects the trade of particular sections. This is a narrow view to take, and if applied impartially would stop all development under Government encouragement. This may help the Pacific coast more directly than any other part of the country, but our prosperity means greater prosperity for other sections, and especially to the Middle West. We purchase great quantities of the products of Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, Missouri, and other States. If we are prosperous, we buy more, and that benefits the people of those States. If we are not prosperous, you suffer.

In 1908 the people of the State of Washington bought the following amounts of farm products from the States named:

Nebraska	$6,375,000
Wisconsin	9,850,000
North and South Dakota	500,000
Iowa	4,060,000
Kansas	2,475,000
Minnesota	5,800,000
Ohio	5,000,000
Indiana	4,000,000
Illinois	8,750,000

All of these farm products we may, and I hope some day will, raise in our own territory. I have no doubt but that our purchases to-day, with an increased population, are far greater than they were in 1908. If we raise these farm products, or if we are unable to buy by reason of lack of prosperity, and cut off this market from your people, it certainly will affect you greatly. This simply illustrates how one section of the country depends upon another, how the prosperity of one section depends upon the prosperity of another section, and how a benefit that comes to one section can benefit another section.

The Soo Canal is no direct benefit to us. We would be better off, so far as our wheat is concerned, if your wheat had to pay tolls, but we do not ask that unless you are going to insist on putting a burden on our coastwise trade through a Government canal. If it is fair for us, it would be fair for you. Would you support a proposition to impose tolls on the ships going through the Soo so that the Treasury might be reimbursed? If the ships alone would pay, why not do it?

But a great light has burst upon the vision of many. Their eyes have been opened, and they see a great octopus, which many of them took to their arms most innocently two years ago. This exemption is a terrible subsidy. What must the people think of many of their Representatives who, selected because of their learning and wisdom, and many of them because they have been denouncing octopuses for many years, and who seem to be able to spy one out on the slightest provocation, innocently took this most terrible of all and fastened it upon the people? Not only that, but when they were assembled for the purpose of telling the people what they favored they gleefully and clearly indorsed this hideous thing and then went out into the campaign and sought to be selected to represent the people, and as one thing commending them to the people they pointed to this great act of theirs, and not until they were elected to office were their eyes opened to what they had imposed upon the people. Their eyes are opened now, or they think they are. They are mistaken. The railroads have thrown dust in their eyes, and they do not know it. They are honest and sincere in their belief, I grant it, but that they are ignorant and mistaken we have good reason to believe. They have confessed that at one time they did not recognize the octopus, and they are likely to be mistaken again. That platform that was such a sacred compact with the people has turned to be nothing but "molasses to catch flies."

Mr. President, if this is a subsidy, then every man on this floor is in favor of a subsidy and has often voted for it. We spend millions of dollars every year to maintain waterways that have cost us over $700,000,000 for improvement, and yet we permit our ships to use these improved waterways without charge, and no one cries "subsidy." On the contrary, some of those who cry "subsidy" the loudest most zealously seek these subsidies. It is just as much a subsidy to exempt ships from the payment of the expense of maintaining the Soo Canal, the Celilo Canal, the locks on the Ohio, and our other waterways as it is to exempt our ships passing through the Panama Canal. You may quibble and differentiate all you will, but you can not alter the fact. We spend hundreds of thousands of dollars every year for lighthouses, life-saving stations, beacons, and other aids to navigation, and thousands of dollars for their maintenance, and make no charge on account of them. If this is not a subsidy, then the exemption it is sought to repeal is not a subsidy. These expenditures benefit especially the navigation companies. It is proposed to spend millions of dollars in aid of road improvement—largely for the benefit of autoists—and our friends will be strongly in favor of it. Will they propose to establish tollgates along the highways so improved and maintained, in order that the Treasury may be reimbursed? Of course not; and yet not to do so is to grant a subsidy to those who use these roads if this exemption is a subsidy. In the agricultural appropriation bill which we just lately passed you spend for the farming industry millions of dollars, and not a cent of it will come back to the Treasury. Millions of this money will go to particular lines of agricultural work and be of no direct benefit to any other. This is a direct subsidy paid out of the Treasury to a particular industry, especially if your contention with reference to it is correct. You expect nothing to come back to the Treasury. It is a subsidy pure and simple. You vote for it and cry for more. Your Postmaster General says that our Government is paying $50,000,000 a year more for carrying second-class mail than it receives. If this canal exemption is a subsidy, then this exemption to the distributers of second-class mail matter is a subsidy. I saw an editorial the other day in a magazine of a great publishing company denouncing this exemption as a subsidy, and yet that same company gets its magazines carried at hundreds of thousands of dollars less than cost. That is a subsidy if this exemption is. You do not seem to be falling over yourselves to stop this subsidy.

The New York World sneeringly says that you might as well ask that your letter be carried free as to ask that ships go through the canal free, and yet it does not object to the subsidy it receives through our postal laws. There is a great movement on foot now to carry a letter for 1 cent, and there may come a time in the no distant future when we may carry letters free, not as a subsidy, but for the general good.

Last year this Government paid out over $600,000 for delivering country newspapers free. Are those who so viciously denounce this exemption as a subsidy taking any steps against this latter subsidy? I hear of none. Are any of the papers that denounce exemption urging on Congress to pass a law requiring them to pay the full cost of carrying and delivering their publications? Not at all. You provided in your tariff bill—you Democrats—that the shipping industry should be favored above other industries and the material for the building of ships should come in free of duty. If this exemption is a subsidy, then this exemption from duty is a subsidy. Your tariff bill also contained a provision giving a rebate of 5 per cent in the duties on goods imported in American ships. If this exemption is a subsidy, then this rebate is a subsidy. Ah, gentlemen, you have been reveling in subsidies, if this exemption is a subsidy, so much and so long that you do not know one when you see it.

But these are not subsidies. They are aids to industry or the release of burdens on business in the interest of the people and for the general welfare. No government can be carried on without them. Different communities receive different benefits and bear lesser burdens and the aggregate results are productive of happiness and prosperity. So it is with this exemption. It is not a subsidy in any sense of the word. No shipowner is paid a single cent out of the Treasury. That is not disputed. He gets no direct benefit. Whatever benefit he gets comes from the use of the canal without having to pay, just as the other interests above referred to get the benefit of the money spent in their behalf without paying. They will act in exactly the same way, too. Does the owner of the country paper that is delivered free determine what the cost of delivery is and charge that up to his patrons? Certainly not. He pays no attention to the cost of delivery, but serves his patrons the best he can, and if he has a competitor his charges are based upon his actual expenses and the people served get the benefit of the free delivery.

When freights are fixed for carrying products through the Soo, do the shipowners figure what the Government pays for maintenance or what they should pay in tolls and add it to their charges? Certainly not. They think nothing of it. They fix their charges without taking that into consideration at all and through competition the people served get the benefit from such exemption. So it will be with the shipping through the canal. In fixing their charges they will not take into account anything except their expenses. The exemption will not be thought of. If competition is sharp, the people will benefit by the exemption in lower rates, and that is what we want and that is the justification for this exemption in addition to the absolute right which the people of one section and industry have to equal treatment with other sections and the same industry.

To impose tolls on the ships is more certainly a subsidy to the railroads than is exempting ships from tolls a subsidy to them. Put tolls on the ship, and, as I have already said, the people will pay such tolls, and in addition the railroads will keep their rates higher, and this means a greater burden on the people.

Why are some people so afraid of benefiting, or subsidizing, if you please, our own shipping when they seem to care nothing for subsidizing foreign shipping? The four hundred millions spent in building the canal is certainly a subsidy to foreign shipping and foreign industries. Our shipping in the foreign trade will get no benefit, because we have none; none to speak of. No one urges such charges as will repay our people the money it has cost to build the canal. In fact, for many years we will be out many millions of dollars each year for repairs, maintenance, interest, and operating charges that we will never get. That is a subsidy to foreign shipping. It is strange to me that we cheerfully and without criticism give to foreigners what we condemn as vicious for our own. If I have favors and encouragement to bestow, I prefer home interests to foreign interests.

They talk of combinations and trusts in the domestic shipping, but what of the trusts and combinations in foreign shipping? The Alexander report to the House of Representatives shows that practically all of the foreign lines are in trusts and controlled by agreements.

Here, Mr. President, I wish to read, so that it may be in the RECORD, a paragraph from this report on page 415 under the title "Recommendations relating to water carriers engaged in the foreign trade." It is a report made by a committee of the House of Representatives which spent a great deal of time investigating the conditions of foreign shipping:

> The facts contained in the foregoing report show that it is the almost universal practice for steamship lines engaging in the American foreign trade to operate, both on the inbound and outbound voyages, under the terms of written agreements, conference arrangements, or gentlemen's understandings which have for their principal purpose the regulation of competition through either (1) the fixing or regulation of rates; (2) the apportionment of traffic by allotting the ports of sailing, restricting the number of sailings, or limiting the volume of freight which certain lines may carry; (3) the pooling of earnings from all or a portion of the traffic; or (4) meeting the competition of nonconference lines. Eighty such agreements or understandings, involving practically all the regular steamship lines operating on nearly every American foreign trade route, are described in the foregoing report.

Oh, Mr. President, while we are so fearful of giving a benefit to some home trust or home combination let us be careful that we do not confer a greater benefit upon foreign trusts and foreign combinations. It is strange that our friends seem to be so friendly to foreign interests, trusts, and combinations; they do not hesitate to assist them. If we must aid a trust, I prefer to aid a domestic trust rather than a foreign trust every time.

Mr. President, the real question is not, should we impose tolls upon our coastwise ships on going through the Panama Canal, but must we do it? Must we tax our people whether we deem it wise or not? If, under the circumstances surrounding us now, we repeal the law which we deliberately passed, we say to the world—and the world will so understand our action—that we admit that we violated a treaty and that hereafter we must impose this toll. We can not repeal this act and again exempt our ships without stultifying ourselves and bringing upon us the contempt of all the world. If we find that it is economically injurious, there is no remedy. We are helpless. For all time to come our people are taxed, whether they will or no, for the benefit of the Canadian Pacific and the Tehuantepec Railways and the transcontinental lines of our own country. Must we, a free and independent people, tax our internal trade and continue that tax forever whether we deem it wise or not? Must we tax our ships going through our canal, built through our own territory, carrying our own trade, no matter how injurious or undesirable it may be? If we must, then we are not sovereign of our own. We have ceased to be an independent, free-acting people. What we have secured and maintained by war we have lost in peace.

Mr. President, if this exemption is illegal, if we must impose the same tolls on our ships that we do on others, then we never can relieve ourselves from this tax. If our contention is correct, and if we maintain our position and assert our right, either to impose or to relieve our ships from this tax, as we see fit, then at any time hereafter when we consider it wise to do so we can impose such tax as we please upon our coastwise shipping. The supreme issue to be determined at the close of this debate is whether or not we can act as we deem wise and best, now and in the future, or whether we must bind ourselves and our people with a perpetual tax upon our coastwise shipping through the Panama Canal.

Some propose that if we find this injurious we can repay directly to our shipping what they have to pay as tolls. Not if we must get England's consent, and that is what we would have to do. She gives us fair warning in her note that she would hold this in violation of the spirit of the treaty, and, while admitting that as a general proposition we have a right to do as other nations do and subsidize our shipping, she will contend that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we can not favor the particular ships going through the canal.

I want the Senate to note this, because it seems to me that many of those who have discussed this proposition heretofore have overlooked the fact that England does not concede our right to repay by direct subsidy the charges that we may impose upon ships going through the Panama Canal.

In the Innes note, after admitting our general right to subsidize our shipping, he says:

> But there is a great distinction between a general subsidy, either to shipping at large or to shipping engaged in any given trade, and a subsidy calculated particularly with reference to the amount of user of the canal by the subsidized lines or vessels. If such a subsidy were granted it would not, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be in accordance with the obligations of the treaty.

In other words, Senators, if we endeavor to repay to our ships that pass through the Panama Canal the tolls which we impose upon them by reason of our treaty, Great Britain will say, "You are violating the spirit of the obligation of that treaty, and you have no right to do it," notwithstanding the fact that England, France, Germany, Spain, and every other nation on the face of the earth that may use this canal, except ourselves, subsidize their own ships, and there is nothing in the treaty to prevent their paying a direct subsidy with reference to this canal; yet Great Britain contends that we have so bound ourselves that we can not even repay as a subsidy the charges collected from our ships in going through the canal. She will pay hers, other nations will pay theirs, but we can not, because we have bound ourselves not to do it.

This is substantially confirmed in Sir Edward Grey's note, which I think I will read so that it may be in the RECORD:

> If the United States exempt certain classes of ships from the payment of tolls the result would be a form of subsidy to those vessels which His Majesty's Government consider the United States are debarred by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from making.

There you have it. Wriggle, twist, squirm as we may, England would hold us as in a vise. We are bound hand and foot as far as our dealings with our own ships going through our canal are concerned. Does anyone doubt if we go to remitting our tolls that England will object and claim that it is in violation of the treaty? And if we admit now that we can not exempt them, will we not have to admit that repaying them is simply a subterfuge and unworthy of a civilized nation? If we have no right to exempt them, England's contention is correct. It is more dishonorable to attempt to do something indirectly rather than directly, and I can not appreciate that high sense of honor that vehemently contends that we can not exempt our shipping but does not blush at the suggestion to take the money with one hand and pay it back with the other.

Much is attempted to be made out of the fact that what is known as the Bard amendment was voted down by a vote of 43 to 27 when the treaty was pending for ratification. That amendment expressly provided that our coastwise trade should be exempt from tolls. Practically every Senator who was then in the Senate states that this was done in the belief that such amendment was unnecessary. This contention is in accord with reason, judgment, and patriotism. No attention is paid to subsequent construction of the treaty provisions. The contention that we have the right to make this exemption has since been sustained by the great majority of our great lawyers, statesmen, and diplomats. Two years ago the Senate construed the treaty in the same way and by a vote of 44 to 11, after free and open discussion, decided that we had this right and not a single Democrat voted against it. That action of the Senate should set at rest any doubt as to the meaning of the vote on the Bard amendment.

The Panama Canal act, which it is sought to amend, was one of the most important acts of a long list of those enacted during the last Republican administration in the interest of the people. In addition to providing for the government of the Canal Zone it contained some of the most far-reaching and progressive provisions for the control of railroad and water transportation for the people's benefit that have ever been placed upon the statute books. It extended the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission far beyond anything that had been dreamed of, by giving it the power (1) to establish physical connection between rail and water carriers, (2) to establish through routes and maximum joint rates over rail and water routes, (3) to establish maximum proportional rates by rail to and from the ports to which the traffic is brought or from which it is taken by the water carrier, and (4) to require any railway company entering into an arrangement with any water carrier for the transportation and handling of business from any port to any other port in the United States, or to any foreign country, to enter into any similar arrangement with all water carriers from that port.

In order to meet certain problems and conditions that had arisen from the apparent control of water competitors by certain railroad lines, and to prevent such control, we empowered the commission to divest the railroad companies of all such control, whether by ownership or otherwise, where the same appeared to be injurious to the people, and in order to insure the freedom of the Panama Canal from such railroad control and to guarantee its effectiveness as an untrammeled water competitor of the railroads, we absolutely prohibited the use of that canal by ships owned, operated, or controlled by the railroads. For the purpose of further insuring the use of this canal by free, independent, and competitive water lines and shipping, we prohibited the use of the canal to trust owned or controlled ships. So far as legislation could do we provided for a canal to be used wholly and exclusively for the benefit of and in the interest of the public. In view of the provisions, what must we say of those claims and assertions made by those favoring this repeal, that this exemption will be and is solely in the interest of trust and railroad owned and controlled ships? Such statements are made ignorantly or with the deliberate purpose to deceive, and are inspired by that insidious lobby that the President has failed to discover.

The provision prohibiting the use of the canal by railroad-owned ships was strenuously opposed by the railroads, and very naturally so. They not only wanted to use this canal with their money-making agencies in connection with their roads, thereby converting it from a canal into a railroad for all practical purposes, but they knew that if their ships were excluded the result would be the construction of independent ships and the establishment of independent shipping lines for this trade and the establishment of real competitive water transportation. They knew that there would be such competition among these new ships and lines that rates would be reduced to the lowest possible limit, and that they would have to meet this competition on goods that could be transported by water as well as by rail. This would benefit the people of the whole country. They failed. Congress excluded railroad ships. It offered an encouragement to the building of new ships by exempting them from the payment of tolls and extending to this internal waterway the same rights and privileges that we have extended to all other waterways. The people rejoiced. They believed that their hopes had been realized and that the most perfect agency possible for the just regulation of transcontinental rates had been provided. It remains to be seen whether these hopes are to be blasted under the leadership of those who rejoiced with the people in their rejoicing and who would never have been intrusted with power if the people had thought or known that this legislation would be largely nullified and, to all intents and purposes, a subsidy given to the railroads. To impose tolls is a discrimination in favor of the railroads, disguise it as you will, and especially in favor of the Canadian Pacific and the Tehuantepec.

Mr. President, the Democratic Party may have the power now to say that one section of the country shall have the benefits of a certain system and that another section shall be denied those benefits. It may have the power to apply one law to one section and another law on the same subject to another section, but the American people are a just people, and they will not long intrust with power those who would perpetuate such outrageous injustice.

The people of the Pacific coast have for many years paid tribute to the transcontinental railroads. They have for many years been urging an isthmian canal. They expected one that would bring relief from the burdens they have so long borne, not one that would fix those burdens in perpetuity. They feel, and feel intensely, that the repeal of this law will be a glaring and unjustifiable discrimination against them and their industries. They for years have been paying their share toward the improvement of our harbors and waterways ungrudgingly, without expecting or receiving any very great direct benefits. They have contributed their part toward the construction of the Panama Canal, and they had a right to expect that they would receive some benefits from it not received by those who have contributed nothing toward its construction They feel that they have a right to equal treatment in a domestic waterway that will be of benefit to them just as the great interests tributary to the Soo Canal get free benefits from it, and they can not characterize too severely those who would be so jealous of the claimed rights of the citizens and interests of a foreign power and directly discriminate against its own. They would not complain if they thought our treaty obligations require this sacrifice on their part, but they insist they do not; and they further insist that there should at least be no weak, abject, unconditional surrender to demands of such great consequence.

We produce great quantities of fruit, fish, hay, grain, and lumber. We want to bring them to the great markets of the East. They want them. The long distance we have to come to reach those markets should be a sufficient handicap in favor of similar products on the Atlantic coast, but it seems not; and it is now proposed to impose upon our products at the Panama Canal what is equivalent to a tariff upon the products of one section of our common country on their being brought into another section of that country. What reason is given? The ships that use the canal should pay part of the cost of running it. In this case they say the ships will pay and the consumers will not have to pay any increase by reason of such charge. They took a tariff of $1.25 per thousand off of the Canadian lumber coming into this country, because, they said, the consumer had to pay it, and to take it off would relieve him.

Now, they would put on what is equal to about $1.50 per thousand on American lumber when it enters an American canal and say that the consumer will not have to pay it. The course of reasoning that leads to the conclusion that if you place $1.25 per thousand upon the lumber of the foreigner the consumer will have to pay it, and yet if you place $1.50 upon the lumber of the domestic producer the consumer will not have to pay it is strange, mysterious, and beyond me. In the case of the foreigner you take a tax off to afford relief to the American consumer, while in the case of our own people you put a tax on for the benefit of the consumer.

The people of the Pacific coast already are at a great disadvantage in the matter of shipping facilities with our neighbors to the north. Their products are substantially the same as ours. They want to get the same markets that we seek. They can carry their products to our markets in foreign ships of any flag, with any kind of crew working under any sort of conditions. We can send our products to our markets only in American ships, with crews as provided by law and working under conditions prescribed by our laws, conditions which we would not change. The result is that our foreign neighbors can get their lumber into the Atlantic markets at about $3 per thousand less than we can, and other products in proportion. Impose tolls on us for passage through our canal and you perpetuate this disadvantage.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the views of some of our people across the line as to the effect of the repeal of this exemption law upon their industries. I have here an extract from the Vancouver (British Columbia) Province, a newspaper, in which they say:

British Columbia lumbermen, hoping to invade the New York market and that of Buenos Aires, are looking forward to the great pageant parade to be held here on June 12 as a means of bringing their lumber wares to the attention of the Atlantic coast and South American buyers. Mr. Harry G. Hayes, who has been appointed by the lumbermen to take charge of their parade at the time of the pageant, pointed out this morning that following the opening of the Panama Canal there was no reason why British Columbia should not capture a large share of the lumber trade of the east coast.

At the present time Washington mills competing against the southern yellow pine interests manage to dispose of a large quantity of Douglas fir every year on the Atlantic coast, selling both in New York and Buenos Aires by cargo as well as shipping overland by car to points in the Eastern States. Although at the present time the British Columbia mills do practically no cargo shipping at all to the east coast and sell comparatively few carloads to the eastern American towns, Mr. Hayes believes that as soon as the canal is opened for commercial business the mill owners of this Province will be placed in a splendid strategical position from a trade point of view.

BRITISH SHIPS CHEAPER.

British bottoms are cheaper on charter than American boats, he points out, and Seattle and Tacoma can not, under American maritime regulations, use British bottoms for carrying shipments to New York. This will mean that Vancouver can ship cargoes to New York cheaper than Washington cities will be able to do through the canal.

* * * * * * *

The net result will be, he points out, that both British Columbia and Washington shippers will be aided by cheaper transportation, and through their ability to use British bottoms the lumbermen of this Province will have an extra advantage over their fellow shippers of Douglas fir in Washington State.

Then I have here a copy of a letter written by the Home Securities Corporation, limited real estate, timber, timber loans, and investment securities, 503-504 Yorkshire Building, Vancouver, British Columbia, March 25, 1914, addressed to George H. Holt, 431 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill. I will read one paragraph of this letter:

If the act providing for the exemption from Panama Canal tolls of American coastwise vessels is repealed, it will be possible to deliver British Columbia timber to the Atlantic seaboard several dollars per thousand cheaper than United States Pacific coast lumber products, due to the lower rate at which foreign ships can carry lumber as compared to American ships, which under present laws are required to carry freight from any American port to any other American port.

Mr. President, we of the Pacific coast had no right to expect such treatment. I protest against it. It is unfair, unjust, discriminatory, and un-American, and contrary to that policy which we have followed for more than 100 years without serious question.

Mr. President, much self-congratulation is indulged in by our Democratic friends over the record they think they have made. They are telling the people of what wonderful things they have accomplished during the year and a half that they have been in control. I do not blame them for getting all they can out of anything they have done, nor are they to be censured for trying to make the country believe that they have made a great record of achievement and constructive legislation. In my judgment the record could not be much worse than it is. Congress has been in continuous session more than a year. What has been done? A tariff law has been passed under which the great prosperity turned over by the Republicans has been checked and in many industries destroyed. Going works have been halted, new enterprises have been abandoned, business is depressed everywhere, labor has lost employment, mills have closed, and the damage inflicted upon the country and its enterprises through Democratic policies is the first we have had since the last Democratic administration turned over to the Republican Party a bankrupt Treasury and a prostrated country. Imports of foreign production are increasing, while exports of American products are decreasing, and with all this none of the promised benefits have come to our people. Wherever the cost of living has been reduced, if at all, it has been done at the expense of and to the injury of some American industry, and generally the American farmer. What its ultimate results will be no one can tell, but there is every indication that the results that have always followed a revenue tariff law will come from this one and that the country will pay in bitter experience for its change in governmental policies.

A currency law has been passed which it is hoped will be an improvement upon the previous system, but the indications are that it will develop into a great political machine, and if it does the disaster that will come to the country will be beyond measure.

The Alaska railroad bill, which I most heartily approve, has been passed, and it is the only measure of any importance that has been enacted that, in my judgment, deserves commendation and will reflect credit on the administration.

These are the only bills of any special importance that have been passed after 14 months of continuous session.

Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that since the 1st of January, while in continuous session, only one legislative act of any considerable importance—the Alaska railroad bill—has been placed upon the statute books by this administration.

This is the record of accomplishment, but it is not the whole record. The civil-service system has been attacked at every opportunity, and provisions of law have been enacted striking down this most efficient system of government. Wherever possible the spoils system has been followed to the detriment of the public service. More planks of the Democratic platform have been repudiated than have been fulfilled. The main effort seems to be to repudiate rather than to fulfill, and notwithstanding the promises of that platform it apparently has been a means of getting in on rather than to be followed.

The promise of economy has been wholly disregarded and appropriations have been made far in excess of any previous administration by many millions of dollars. Offices have been increased, not reduced. None of the unnecessary offices denounced in the platform and on the stump have been abolished, but new ones have been created. Appointments have been made in Alaska and the District of Columbia of nonresidents as if no declaration against such a policy had ever been made.

Every effort is now being put forth and every influence exerted to repeal the toll-exemption law, which was especially commended in the platform and by its candidates while on the stump, and the result will be the nullification of the main provisions of the Panama act inserted for the protection of the people by the Republican Party.

You have signed a treaty with Colombia apologizing for a prompt, wise, statesmanlike, and fully justifiable act in the interest of the world's progress, and you have agreed to pay to her $25,000,000 of blackmail money and have given her ships rights in our canal which you claim can not be given our own. Thank God such a treaty can not be ratified except by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, and the people will not elect a Senate that will ratify such an infamous bargain.

Conditions in Mexico are going from bad to worse. We are in Mexico over a dispute between this Government and a puny individual, and we can not come out until order and stable government are brought to that distracted, chaotic, and bandit-ridden nation. Every day's delay now, in my judgment, means the loss of many precious lives and the expenditure of millions of treasure. The more prompt and energetic the action now the fewer lives will be lost and the less expenditure incurred. We are the laughing stock of the nations and a jeer and a byword in diplomacy, not so much because of our legislation but by reason of the incompetence and inexperience of our executive officers.

That is your record. You may be satisfied with it. From a political standpoint I am, but I wish it were better for the people who must suffer.

Gentlemen, make the most of your opportunity. Your power will soon cease. The great majority of the people will not allow the minority to rule very long, especially when it rules by policies so strongly opposed by the majority. In 1916 the majority will be together not only in principle but in the voting booths of the country. They will be together for principles rather than following men. Those who believe in the maintenance of the civil service; those who believe in legislation for the benefit, health, and comfort of children, women, and labor and the general improvement of social conditions; those who believe in the necessity for a protective tariff system for the prosperity of the country, the encouragement of labor, and the development of our industries; those who believe in the uniform application of our laws to every section of the country; those who believe in a firm, just, and dignified attitude toward all nations and who insist that this Government must and will do as it deems wise and best with its own property, its own territory, and its own domestic concerns will act, talk, and vote together under the leadership of that man who will best represent and exemplify the demands and sentiments of the people, and there can be no doubt of the result. The Democratic Party will be overthrown and the party under which this country has prospered as no other nation on the face of the earth, under which every great statute on the books to-day for the benefit and uplift of our people has been enacted, and under whose leadership the honor of the Nation has been upheld and the respect and esteem of the world secured will be reinstated, and the Republican Party will be continued in control until the people must again learn by sad experience.

Mr. President, the request of the President to repeal this law is the most amazing, unwarranted, audacious, humiliating, and un-American demand ever made of an independent coordinate legislative body of self-governing people. Amazing because made unexpectedly and without any demand or sentiment whatever from our own people; unwarranted because the alleged and supposed facts upon which it is based do not exist, other countries have not protested, England asked arbitration and not repeal, and no matters of delicate or nearer consequence exist that depend upon its repeal; audacious because contrary to party declarations, public professions, and the almost unanimous verdict of the people, and made upon the legislative body without reason or argument, but as a request or demand; humiliating because it requires a confession of the deliberate violation of a treaty and the spoliation of a nation's honor by the Congress and the President; and un-American because it involves an unconditional and inexcusable surrender of the rights of the American people and the sovereignty of the Nation. If we heed the demand of the President, we will, in the opinion of the world, confess that we have no right under the treaty to pass such legislation, and we surrender, so far as we can, for all time our right to do so. We may do this thing, but the American people will not have their rights foreclosed in this way. They approved this legislation. We propose to repeal it without their request and without their consent and against their will. We have no moral right to do it. We do not here represent ourselves; we do not here represent the Executive; we are the representatives of the people. The rights and powers that we have are their rights and powers, not ours. They expect us to uphold their rights rather than seek to give them a reputation for generosity at the expense of their vital interests. This question does affect their vital interests and the patriotic sentiment of the country. If party platforms and campaign pledges are repudiated and this law repealed without giving the people an opportunity to express their views upon an issue that has never been submitted to them, we will have to answer in the forum where the people's voice and will must be heard and heeded.

Repeal this law and the Democratic Party must answer for it before every constituency in the land. Repeal this law now and the people will reaffirm their right of control over their own property and their own territory and their right to determine the treatment that shall be accorded their domestic trade, and I want to warn the nations of the world that the people will again write this exemption upon the statute books. They will settle this question, and they will settle it right. Nations are moved largely by the same influences and impulses that affect individuals, and act very much in the same way. They represent the aggregate natures and dispositions of their individual citizenship. The individual who cringes before another and yields his rights uncontendingly, in the hope of securing good will and favor, loses his rights, secures the contempt of his aggressor, and becomes a prey to the selfishness of his neighbors. Yielding our rights and the rights of our citizens at the behest of England without contest, without even protesting, sacrificing the interest of our citizens to secure her approbation, abandoning our domestic policy to secure her assistance, only lessens her good opinion of us and makes us the laughing stock of nations both weak and strong and the victim of their covetousness and cupidity. Instead of securing a reputation for generosity, we will be regarded as weak, servile, and fawning. Help, assistance, and a reputation for generosity bought at such a price are a weakness. National respect is secured by the firm insistence upon the rights of your Nation and your citizens no less than by the scrupulous observance of treaty obligations, and if this Nation has lost the respect and confidence of the nations of the earth it is by reason of a weak, uncertain, vacillating policy in our treatment of foreign problems, and not by our disregard of treaty stipulations. England to-day commands the respect and admiration of the world because of the protection she affords her citizens and the tenacity with which she insists upon their rights. We might profit by her example.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] in a most interesting speech urges that we repeal the law and arbitrate the question at issue. This is a strange position. If we repeal the law there is nothing to arbitrate. England has secured all she wants. We have given up all we have. Even if a moot case could be presented to a board of arbitration, but little attention would be given our claim in view of our open confession that we have no right to make the exemption. It would be like going into court having solemnly acknowledged your cause to be unjust and the result would be the same. This question ought not to be made the football of American politics. This law should stand as it is until our rights are passed upon by some tribunal in which we have confidence. Unless we are to insist upon our clear rights, provision should be made for testing this question before the Supreme Court of the United States, a tribunal whose decision all would cheerfully accept as final. Or let us request the Executive to submit a proposal for arbitration before a tribunal in whose verdict we would have confidence. This would not be difficult. A treaty modeled after that submitted by the last administration would result in a fair and a just verdict. We asked England to arbitrate. She said she was willing to arbitrate. Why did not this administration take that course? This is left to speculation and conjecture.

Here I want to read an extract from the letter of the British minister bearing upon this particular point. Here is a letter from Sir Edward Grey in which he says:

> But they recognize that many persons of note in the United States, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, hold that the provisions of the act do not infringe the conventional obligations by which the United States is bound, and under these circumstances they desire to state their perfect readiness to submit the question to arbitration if the Government of the United States would prefer to take this course.

Then he made a suggestion that is significant, especially in view of the action taken by this administration. Those who think that to repeal this law would not commit us absolutely and forever to the fact that the passage was a violation of the treaty should note this language by Sir Edward Grey:

> A reference to arbitration would be rendered unnecessary if the Government of the United States should be prepared to take such steps as would remove the objections to the act which His Majesty's Government have stated.

In other words, if we would repeal the law, then there would be no reason for arbitration further. Now, what did our Government say about arbitration? What was the suggestion made before this administration came into power? Here is what Secretary Knox said:

> If it should be found as a result of such examination—

That is, an examination into the facts, about which some question seems to have been raised—

If it should be found as a result of such an examination on the part of Great Britain that a difference of opinion exists between the two Governments on any of the important questions of fact involved in this discussion, then a situation will have arisen which, in the opinion of this Government, could with advantage be dealt with by referring the controversy to a commission of inquiry for examination and report in the manner provided for in the unratified arbitration treaty of August 3, 1911, between the United States and Great Britain.

In other words, both Governments before this administration had come into power had committed themselves as being willing to arbitrate this question. Why is it that this administration proposes not to arbitrate but to surrender absolutely and without question on a question of such great importance to us and our domestic policy if it is not willing to insist upon what the vast majority of our people believe we are clearly entitled to?

Repeal this law now and the people will rewrite it and insist upon it until it is accepted by all, or some such method followed to determine our rights. This is the only way to maintain our dignity before the world and preserve our self-respect and honor. The abject confession, the self-abasement, and self-degredation which is now asked of us is more than any nation or people can grant, and the American people will not tolerate it on the part of its representatives. Honor can not be maintained by dishonor; rights can not be preserved by surrender.

Mr. President, glowing eulogies of John Hay have been uttered during this debate by those seeking the repeal of this law. He deserves all that can be said of him. He was one of our greatest statesmen and a most loyal patriot. While firm for the fulfillment of our national obligations and devoted to peace, he was intensely American. To repeal this law for the reason that we had no right to pass it would, in my judgment, reflect upon his intelligence, question his patriotism, and sully his fame. He would not be hunting reasons and relying on quibbles to destroy the Americanism of this great enterprise. He has spoken. His own words show his attitude toward this canal. They refute the suggestions of those who would use his great fame and high character to bolster up a theory that would deprive us of a fair, just, reasonable, and American control of this richest American heritage. In transmitting the treaty to Congress he said—and these words present the whole case of the Republic, and before them all quibbles and fine-spun theories and far-fetched reasoning vanish like frost before the rising sun:

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed, it is exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed and controlled and defended by it.

I have here an article dealing with the purely legal question of our right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to exempt our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls, prepared by former United States Judge George Donworth, a lawyer of Seattle and one of the leading lawyers of our State. I ask that it may be printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

IS THE STATUTE EXEMPTING THE COASTWISE VESSELS FROM PAYMENT OF TOLLS FOR THE USE OF THE PANAMA CANAL IN VIOLATION OF THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY?

[Memorandum by George Donworth, of Seattle, Wash.]

Probably no section of the country will suffer more than the State of Washington from the proposed repeal of the statute exempting coastwise vessels from payment of tolls for the use of the Panama Canal. Our great product, lumber, should be allowed to reach the markets of the East without unnecessary burdens, and we feel that not only as to this product, but as to all other articles of commerce between this State and the markets of the East, the canal, built by American genius and American money, should be utilized as far as possible for the benefit of the American people.

Some advocates of the repeal take the position that the tolls exemption violates the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and must be abandoned from the standpoint of national honor, while others frankly admit that the treaty permits the exemption, but favor a repeal on other grounds of policy.

There is so much at stake in both phases of the question that it is to be hoped those who take the latter view will at least not vote for an outright repeal without embodying in the repealing statute a positive declaration of the right of the United States to restore the exemption whenever it sees fit. In view of the President's message and the legal argument on the construction of the treaty made by most of his supporters, the passage of the repealing act without some such reservation will forever estop us not only on the question of free tolls, but on the question of the right to use the Canal Zone as a base in time of war, as hereinafter pointed out.

In article 2 of the treaty it is agreed that the canal may be constructed directly by the Government of the United States, and that this Government, subject to the provisions of the treaty, "shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal."

Article 3 begins with the statement that "the United States adopts" certain rules. It is to be noted in the outset that the effect of this language is to recognize the canal as the property of the United States, and that this Government "adopts" certain rules for its regulation. The language does not say that Great Britain and the United States jointly adopt any rules. The canal is recognized as belonging to the United States, with all the incidents of such ownership, subject to the provisions of the treaty, one of the provisions being that this Government adopts certain regulations. These regulations should therefore be construed in the same manner as regulations adopted by any nation regarding its own property are construed. The general recognition of the canal as the property of the United States, with all incidental rights resulting therefrom, applies to all questions. That is to say, the presumption on all questions is in favor of the right of the United States to legislate as it sees fit, and such legislation is valid unless it contravenes some one of the rules which by the terms of the treaty "the United States adopts."

The argument of our opponents is based upon subdivision 1 of article 3, which states that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges and traffic or otherwise."

The treaty speaks for itself that the restriction as to terms of equality is "so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation." The prevention of discrimination is the gist of the provision. That was the object to be attained. Great Britain has no right to complain of anything under this clause which does not amount to a discrimination. As her vessels are barred in any event from the coasting trade, no exemption freeing from tolls our vessels while engaged in the coasting trade can possibly violate this provision.

The argument of our opponents on this point proves too much. If we admit their argument as valid, we must allow Great Britain to dictate many other changes in our local laws. For instance, the existing treaty of commerce and navigation with Great Britain, that of 1815, provides in the second article that "no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels." (See Compilation of Treaties in force 1904, p. 309.)

The language of this clause is much clearer than the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in that the 1815 treaty expressly refers to vessels of the United States instead of vessels of all nations. Nevertheless, United States vessels engaged in the coasting trade are exempt from the payment of State pilotage charges. A British vessel arriving at the port of New York is subject to pilotage charges. So is an American vessel arriving there from a foreign port. But an American vessel engaged in the coastwise trade—that is, arriving from an American port, even Porto Rico or Hawaii—is free from these charges. (Huus v. New York & Porto Rico S. S. Co., 182 U. S., 392.)

The Supreme Court distinctly holds that there is no just ground for the claim of discrimination in regulations which favor our coastwise shipping as against other shipping, notwithstanding the treaty of 1815. (Olsen v. Smith, 195 U. S., 332.)

No nation, so far as known, has ever protested against this discrimination in favor of the coasting trade. In many other respects the coasting trade is favored by our statutes. In fact, the favoring of the coasting trade by statute has been so uniformly a part of the policy of the United States since the foundation of the Government that it would be difficult to enumerate all the instances of such favoring. The clause of the 1815 treaty above quoted is far stronger in support of the right of the British vessels to exemption from pilotage charges in the port of New York than is the disputed clause in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in support of the claim of impropriety of free toll's for coasting vessels in the canal.

A treaty should be so interpreted as to give effect to the object designed; and for that purpose all of its provisions must be examined in the light of attendant and surrounding circumstances. (Roes v. McIntyre, 140 U. S., 453.)

Now, the attendant and surrounding circumstances in the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty include the historical attitude which the United States had always taken with reference to its coastwise trade. The circumstances also include the fact that the only consideration which Great Britain furnished for our engagements in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was the annulment of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the canal itself being built entirely by funds contributed by the American people. Another circumstance to be borne in mind is the definite position which the American Government had declared and pursued for years with reference to such a canal. For instance, in the message of President Hayes to Congress, March 18, 1880, he said:

"An interoceanic canal across the American Isthmus will essentially change the geographical relations between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States and between the United States and the rest of the world. It would be the great ocean thoroughfare between our Atlantic and our Pacific shores and virtually a part of the coast line of the United States. Our merely commercial interest in it is greater than that of all other countries, while its relation to our power and prosperity as a nation, to our means of defense, our unity, peace, and safety are matters of paramount concern to the people of the United States. No other great power would under similar circumstances fail to assert a rightful control over a work so closely and vitally affecting its interest and welfare." (Messages and Papers of the Presidents, vol. 7, p. 586.)

It is inconceivable that America should have surrendered for no definite consideration except the abrogation of a defunct treaty the rights and interests so clearly pointed out by President Hayes or that Great Britain should ever have thought so.

Discrimination being the only thing covenanted against, there can be no just ground for claiming a violation of the treaty by a regulation which imposes no tolls on vessels engaged in a class of trade which is prohibited on any terms whatever to the ships of Great Britain and other foreign countries.

What is the real ground of Great Britain's complaint? The real grounds are:

First. The Canadian Pacific Railway, which wants to reduce the effect of the competition of the canal to a minimum; and Second. The commercial ambitions of the citizens of British Columbia, who feel that in their commercial rivalry with the cities of our Pacific coast they have much to gain and nothing to lose by burdening as much as possible the coastwise traffic of those cities.

As to the railroad, no one, I suppose, will for a moment claim that it is entitled to be heard in the matter. In fact, it keeps in the background. It has no direct interest in the question of discrimination in toll charges for ships passing through the canal. Its indirect interest is the same as that of the American transcontinental railroads. The interest of both is in favor of making the canal a failure. No argument from the point of view of those whose interest is inimical to the success of the canal deserves any consideration whatever. The treaty must be presumed to have intended that the canal should be a success, not a failure.

The citizens of British Columbia will gain much by imposing the burden of tolls upon American vessels using the canal in the coastwise trade, but the advantage which they will derive is merely the advantage which any competitor gets from handicapping his rival. Of course the proposed enactment would not reduce the charges on ships bound to or from British Columbia by one penny. It would merely add burdens to American ships doing business with Washington, Oregon, and California. The British Columbia lumbermen, by reason of being able to use foreign bottoms, will be able to transport their lumber to ports in the Atlantic States at a much lower rate than the Puget Sound lumbermen, and if this handicap is not in part counterbalanced by free tolls, the British Columbia lumbermen will have an advantage that will be insuperable. It is no answer to say that if they have this natural advantage they are entitled to retain it in the use of the canal. No natural advantage that they have will be in the slightest degree interfered with by the tolls exemption on our coastwise ships. The charges on their ships are a constant factor in either case. To admit that the treaty prevents us from encouraging our own shipping in a line of business not open to them is to convict the President and Senate who approved and ratified this treaty of stupidity. It should be axiomatic that as the citizens of British Columbia have no right to engage in the coasting trade, they are not concerned legally in any question affecting the tolls on American vessels so engaged any more than they are concerned in any other condition prescribed for the conduct of the coasting trade.

The situation in a nutshell is that the foreign competitor (the British Columbia lumberman) having no interest in the coasting trade or the tolls charged therefor, asks the United States to raise the cost of conducting the coasting trade so that he, the foreign competitor, may take away the trade from his American rival.

If the lumbermen of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia should protest under the treaty of 1815 against admitting lumber-laden vessels from the State of Maine to enter the port of New York without paying pilotage charges, they would have a far stronger case legally and morally than the British Columbia lumbermen have as to the canal tolls.

The fact that citizens of the United States can by means of coasting vessels transport goods under specially favorable conditions from one port to another in the United States has never been considered a discrimination against a foreign port which by means of foreign vessels ships or desires to ship the same class of goods to the same American port. Is Nova Scotia discriminated against because our vessels engaged in the coasting trade can carry coal from Philadelphia to the Boston market, whereas different laws apply to like shipments from Nova Scotia to Boston? Does the treaty of 1815, above quoted, require us to give the same rights to ships arriving from a foreign port as to ships arriving from one of our own ports? By no means. There can be no such thing as discrimination unless the party claiming to be injured has the right to do the thing concerning which the alleged advantage is conferred. If there is any discrimination at all, it goes back to the original prohibition against foreign ships engaging in the coasting trade. If that prohibition stands, all the rest is mere detail, a variation in degree and not in kind.

In construing statutes aimed to prevent discrimination the principle above suggested is invariably applied. For instance, the national banking act, United States Revised Statutes, section 5219, prohibits the taxation of the shares of national banks at any higher rate than other moneyed capital in the hands of individuals. From the beginning the Supreme Court has held that although the word "discrimination" does not occur in the statute, the obvious intention of Congress was to prevent the States from discriminating in matters of taxation against national bank shares. Consequently, that court has frequently held that it is immaterial what rate of taxation is imposed by the States on moneyed capital that does not come into competition with national banks. The expression "other moneyed capital," though general in terms, is restricted by the obvious purpose of the statute to moneyed capital which is in competition with that invested in national banks.

"The result seems to be that the term 'moneyed capital' as used in the Federal statutes does not include capital which does not come into competition with the business of national banks, and that exemptions from taxation, however large, such as deposits in savings banks or of moneys belonging to charitable institutions, which are exempted for reasons of public policy, and not as an unfriendly discrimination as against investments in national banks, can not be regarded as forbidden by the Federal statute." First National Bank v. Chapman (173 U. S., 205, p. 214); also First National Bank of Aberdeen v. Chehalis County (166 U. S., 440); National Bank of Commerce v. Seattle (166 U. S., 463); Commercial National Bank v. Chambers (182 U. S., 556).

Some of our opponents urge that the exemption of coastwise shipping from payment of tolls amounts to a discrimination because it increases the burden of all other ships not so exempted. This is an a priori statement of a purely dogmatic character, as it can not be known at present whether the aggregate amount of all tolls at the rate imposed will or can reimburse the United States for the cost of operation and a fair interest on the investment. The best-informed opinion seems to indicate that the canal will be operated at a loss, even though tolls be levied on all ships of every character passing through it. Whether such will be the case or not can be positively determined only by experience. After the lapse of a reasonable time it will be possible to demonstrate whether an equitable distribution of the entire cost of operation and interest upon all ships would have resulted in a lower rate of tolls than that imposed upon British and other foreign shipping. If experience shows that the entire receipts of the canal plus an amount equal to the remitted tolls on coastwise vessels would still be less than the operating expense plus interest, no nation can truthfully say that it has been overcharged. If the United States sees fit to operate the canal at a loss, no one can claim to be injured if it makes that loss greater by exempting certain of its shipping with which foreign nations do not compete

If, on the other hand, experience should prove that a fair return on the investment and the operating cost are more than equaled by the toll receipts plus the potential receipts remitted on coastwise vessels, then for the first time will the British and foreign shipowners have the right to complain. If that situation arises, the United States Government will certainly deal equitably and fairly with the situation in exact accordance with the treaty, though even then it will not be known how many coastwise ships would have used the canal if tolls had to be paid.

The Supreme Court has frequently refused to hold a rate or charge invalid for the reason that it may prove to be in excess of the amount needed for raising a certain revenue.

In Patapsco Guano Co. v. Board of Agriculture (171 U. S., 345), where the validity of an inspection charge levied under State authority was attacked on the ground that the charge was excessive (State inspection fees being limited by the Federal Constitution to the amount required for the enforcement of the State inspection laws), the court said (p. 354): "If the receipts are found to average largely more than enough to pay the expenses, the presumption would be that the legislature would moderate the charge." The same opinion quotes from the case of Neilson v. Garza (2 Woods, 287), and approves the language of Mr. Justice Bradley in that case, as follows:

"How the question whether a duty is excessive or not is to be decided may be doubtful. As that question is passed upon by the State legislature when the duty is imposed, it would hardly be seemly to submit it to the consideration of a jury in every case that arises. This might give rise to great diversity of judgment, the result of which would be to make the law constitutional one day and in one case and unconstitutional another day in another case. As the article of the Constitution which prescribes the limit goes on to provide that all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of Congress, it seems to me that Congress is the proper tribunal to decide the question whether a charge or duty is or is not excessive. If, therefore, the fee allowed in this case by the State law is to be regarded as in effect an impost or duty on imports and exports, still, if the law is really an inspection law, the duty must stand until Congress shall see fit to alter it. Then we are brought back to the question whether the law is really an inspection law. If it is, we can not interfere with it on account of supposed excessiveness of fees."

Under the treaty the United States is to fix the tolls and charges, and the presumption is—in fact, it is a certainty—that if experience, the only guide, proves them to be excessive, they will be promptly and adequately reduced and due reparation made to any injured party.

In Knoxville v. Knoxville Water Co. (212 U. S., 1), where the water company was asking the court to enjoin the enforcement of a municipal ordinance fixing water rates, the court said:

"Where the case rests, as it does here, not upon the observation of the actual operation under the ordinance, but upon speculations as to its effect, based upon the operations of a prior fiscal year, we will not guess whether the substantial return certain to be earned would lack something of the return which would save the effect of the ordinance from confiscation. It is enough that the whole case leaves us in grave doubt. The valuation of the property was an estimate, and is greatly disputed. The expense account was not agreed upon. The ordinance had not actually been put into operation; the inferences were based upon the operations of the preceding year; and the conclusion of the court below rested upon that most unsatisfactory evidence, the testimony of expert witnesses employed by the parties. * * * If hereafter it shall appear, under the actual operation of the ordinance, that the returns allowed by it operates as a confiscation of property, nothing in this judgment will prevent another application to the courts."

In Willcox v. Gas Co. (212 U. S., 19), where the Consolidated Gas Co. of New York was attacking the validity of a statute reducing gas rates in the city of New York, the court said:

"Upon a careful consideration of the case before us we are of opinion that the complainant has failed to sustain the burden cast upon it of showing beyond any just or fair doubt that the acts of the Legislature of the State of New York are in fact confiscatory. It may possibly be, however, that a practical experience of the effect of the acts by actual operation under them might prevent the complainant from obtaining a fair return, as already described, and in that event complainant ought to have the opportunity of again presenting its case to the court."

It is clear, therefore, that where the contention is that charges are too high, as claimed in the Patapsco case, or that they are too low, as claimed in the gas and water cases hereinbefore cited, the Supreme Court of the United States recognizes that experience is the only guide to relief, and that in all doubtful cases interested parties must await the actual results before applying to the courts for a change. No doubt the same principle is recognized and applied in the courts of Great Britain.

If this is the rule applied in ordinary cases to public-service corporations where the experience of similar corporations throws much light upon the probable earnings and expense, how much stronger is the reason for applying the rule to the greatest improvement ever undertaken by man, where all calculations as to expenses and earnings must be problematical and conjectural.

Suppose an act be now passed enabling anyone who claims that the tolls-exemption statute has caused him damage by taking away or impairing a right secured by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to bring suit for damages against the United States in the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal by either party to the Supreme Court; could any such damages be recovered? Let those who answer this question affirmatively consent to put it to the test. If we must show our good faith by concession while Great Britain shows hers by insistence, the passage of such an act should certainly cover the ground. We believe we are right, and, the matter being one of domestic policy, we adhere to our course until shown to be wrong. In the meantime, if anyone suffers by our act, we will indemnify him.

All that has been said so far holds true, whether or not the expression "any nation" in article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty includes the United States, since the exemption of coastwise shipping does not amount to a discrimination as to other nations, all of them being prohibited from engaging on any terms in the coastwise trade. When it comes, however, to the question of the meaning of those provisions of article 3 which relate to war and naval operations, involving the highly important question of the national defense, it becomes necessary to consider whether "any nation" includes our own. The canal is owned by the United States. The Canal Zone is ours also, so far as concerns all the world, this Nation having all rights of sovereignty and government therein. The treaty, therefore, is to be construed like any other treaty granting rights to other nations. It in terms states that this Government possesses all rights growing out of the construction and ownership of the canal, with the added qualification that these rights are "subject to the provisions" of the treaty. There can be no doubt that this means that this Nation possesses every right which it has not parted with, just as is the case with the rights of government exercised in our domestic national territory. How can it be fairly claimed in such circumstances the nation possessing all governmental and sovereign rights "adopting" certain rules meant to refer to itself by the expression "any nation"? It must not be forgotten that it is the United States which "adopts" the rules, not the United States and Great Britain jointly. The selection of this unusual form of language indicates a purpose, and full effect must be given to it.

It can not be conceded that the United States is required by the treaty to grant the same rights to a belligerent with whom it may be at war as it exercises for itself. If we concede that "any nation" includes the United States, the canal, instead of being an aid to our national defense, will become a detriment.

Paragraph 5 of article 3 practically defines the canal as including the waters within 3 marine miles of either end, substantially the entire width of the Canal Zone. Is it possible that in case we have war with a foreign nation, say, with an ally of Great Britain, that the latter country may insist that we refrain from all military and naval operations in the Canal Zone not permitted to our enemy; that we may police the canal, but must police it impartially for our enemy and for ourselves?

In the treaty of 1903 between the United States and Panama, by which the concession for the canal is granted, it is provided in article 25 that Panama will sell or lease to the United States lands adequate and necessary for naval or coaling stations on the Pacific and Caribbean coasts of the Republic, but this is declared to be "for the better performance of the engagements of this convention, and to the end of the efficient protection of the canal and the preservation of its neutrality." Article 23 of the same treaty permits to the United States certain military and naval operations, but this right also is to be granted "for the safety or protection of the canal."

Now, if we admit that "any nation" in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty includes the United States, what are we going to do when we are involved in war with a foreign power, possibly an ally of Great Britain? Must we then neutralize the Canal Zone and permit it to be exposed to the treacherous act of our enemy because of the construction now placed by Great Britain upon the expression "any nation"? Must we escort our enemy's battleships and torpedo boats and submarines on their errand of destruction against our ships and our harbors?

If this Government is required, in answering these questions, to take the altruistic and broad view, at the same time conceding to other nations the right to take the selfish and narrow view, how can we hope to have the treaty interpreted justly in times of stress and bitterness such as prevail during a great war?

This position is in no way weakened by the second sentence of paragraph 2 of article 3 of the treaty, stating that the United States shall be at liberty to maintain military police along the canal to protect it against lawlessness and disorder. This sentence was inserted by this Government to avoid the claim that the sentence immediately preceding would prohibit the fortification of the canal. The two sentences in paragraph 2 of article 3 are to be read together, and the second is merely inserted to avoid an improper interpretation of the first. Both sentences are subject to the general declaration in article 2 that the United States Government shall have and enjoy all rights arising from the ownership and control of the canal except as otherwise provided in the treaty.

It is said that the good faith of this Nation is now in question by reason of its exemption of coastwise shipping from payment of tolls. Is our international reputation for good faith to be improved by admitting the charge of bad faith? We have in this country a tribunal that enjoys as high a reputation as any tribunal on earth for the settlement of controversies. Our Constitution and system of government make it the final arbiter of disputed questions concerning the interpretation of Constitution, treaties, and statutes. Our good faith can be abundantly shown by enacting such legislation as will permit any person, alien or citizen, who feels himself aggrieved by the free-tolls provision, to begin and maintain a suit in our courts, with the right of appeal to our highest tribunal. We should not submit to foreign arbitration any question affecting the terms on which our coastwise trade, in which foreigners are not interested, shall be carried on. By parity of reasoning we should not surrender our just convictions and our settled policy on this subject under threat of the accusation of bad faith.

To repeal the tolls exemption under existing circumstances can not fail to amount to an interpretation of the treaty by the political department of the Government. Such interpretation will be forever binding upon the courts. (Latimer v. Poteet, 14 Pet., 4.)

In considering this vitally important question we must not overlook the fact that the statesmen of Great Britain have invariably looked with a biased eye upon the carrying trade of the world. It is unnecessary to refer to the British navigation laws prior to the Revolution, which were a potent cause of the difficulties between Great Britain and the Colonies. After independence was established the statutes of Great Britain continued to be framed so as to secure, as far as possible, a monopoly of the shipping of the world for British owners.

An extremely interesting historical review of the British and American navigation laws is found in the opinion of Mr. Justice Wayne, in Oldfield v. Marriott (10 How., 146). The eminent justice there says that the freedom now accorded to the shipping of the different nations in foreign ports throughout the world is due to the initiative of the United States, which forced from a reluctant British Government changes in the navigation laws of that country. The principle of reciprocal rights between shipping of the different nations was not adopted by Great Britain until the initiative of the United States forced her to do so. This reciprocity has never been extended to the coasting trade, and if the pending statute repealing free tolls on coastwise American shipping is enacted, it will be the first time that a purely domestic policy of this country has been changed at the dictation of a foreign power.

The British statesmen of a century ago—as pointed out by Mr. Justice Wayne, supra—did not like the new policy which the United States then adopted. This Nation, however, did not deem that fact of sufficient importance to induce it to recede from a course that seemed to it right and proper. Neither our self-respect nor the respect of other nations was lost by adhering to an American policy.

It is not necessary in the slightest to question the good faith of the British ministry in the present difference of opinion. They are actuated, however, by a point of view which is the growth of many centuries, a point of view which regards the sea as the special sphere of the British nation, and can not understand how any people can do anything on the sea on terms not entirely satisfactory to that nation. Its statesmen treat as immaterial the overwhelming circumstance that this canal has been built by another people, who have exclusively furnished for the achievement their own genius, their own money, and their own statesmanship. If there is a narrow view, all the traditions of the past should not be disregarded in the endeavor to ascertain where it is found.

Mr. JONES. I have refrained from taking up the matter of shipping development and the steps that Great Britain has especially taken to promote her foreign shipping on every occasion, but I have here an address delivered by Mr. A. R. Smith, an expert on shipping and shipping laws, which I also ask to make a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MR. SMITH'S ADDRESS.

What possible interest has an organization of business men in the city of Lawrence, in the State of Massachusetts, in the subject of our merchant marine? Would you say a sentimental interest, only? During the first half of the past century and a quarter the name and the fame of Massachusetts extended to the uttermost ends of the earth. The incomparable ships built in its shipyards were both the envy and despair of foreign rivals. They and the flag that they carried commanded respect in every port of the known world. As a Massachusetts man I spent several years afloat in different parts of the world in American ships. The history of the golden era of the American ship—long before my time—warms my blood and arouses my pride. But, like a bucket of cold water dashed in my face, comes the realization that Massachusetts men are not to-day summoned to the launching or the sailing of a matchless clipper ship; but, on the contrary, they are invited to the obsequies of the remnant of what remains of a once powerful and prosperous industry. In that industry Massachusetts led all other States, and the records of its ships are unequaled in the annals of history—they outranked anything that ever sailed the seas. They shed imperishable renown upon the United States, those magnificent clippers of a bygone era.

Your immediate and pressing interest in the American merchant marine lies in this: Our manufacturers have outstripped production; our people do not and can not consume all we make. We must find and hold and develop foreign markets that will absorb our surplus, or else mills and factories must shut down and hundreds of thousands of skilled men will be compelled to seek employment in trades in which they are unskilled. We can not depend upon the iron-hand copper-fastened foreign shipping trust to find and hold and develop markets for us. We must have our own ships—there is no escaping it.

Eighteen years ago I had reason to believe that the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts would lead in restoring American ships to the seas, but during the intervening years I have bitterly realized that "hope deferred maketh the heart sick."

Just 18 years ago the Massachusetts Republican State convention made this declaration in the platform it adopted in the spring of that year:

"We have always given protection to our shipbuilders. In late years we have neglected to protect our shipowners. We believe the time has come to return to the policy of Washington and Hamilton, which, by discriminating duties in favor of American bottoms, secured 90 per cent of our carrying trade to American ships, and which if now restored would again revive our shipping and cause American freights to be paid to Americans."

That Massachusetts declaration led to the adoption of this similar declaration in the platform adopted in 1896 by the Republican national convention at St. Louis:

"We favor restoring the early American policy of discriminating duties for the upbuilding of our merchant marine and the protection of our shipping in the foreign carrying trade, so that American ships—the product of American labor, employed in American shipyards, sailing under the Stars and Stripes, and manned, officered, and owned by Americans—may regain the carrying of our foreign commerce."

And in his letter accepting his party's nomination for the Presidency the late President McKinley indorsed that declaration in this unqualified and ringing statement:

"The policy of discriminating duties in favor of our shipping which prevailed in the early years of our history should be again promptly adopted by Congress and vigorously supported until our prestige and supremacy on the seas is fully attained. We should no longer contribute directly or indirectly to the maintenance of the colossal marine of foreign countries, but provide an efficient and complete marine of our own. Now that the American Navy is assuming a position commensurate with our importance as a nation, a policy I am glad to observe the Republican platform strongly indorses, we must supplement it with a merchant marine that will give us the advantages in both our coastwise and foreign trade that we ought naturally and properly to enjoy. It should be at once a matter of public policy and national pride to repossess this immense and prosperous trade."

The Republican Party has never repudiated, but it has always evaded, that pledge. Foreign shipping interests are strong and influential—American shipping interests are weak and impotent. Foreign Governments will resent any legislation that would permanently restore American ships to foreign trade. It is not regarded as "worth while" to risk arousing foreign resentment. Then the alleged difficulties in the way of terminating existing trade treaties are too many, although each such treaty in express terms provides for the honorable withdrawal of either party to it; and it is further alleged that "the dangers of retaliation" are so great as to discourage the undertaking. Many of the most influential of our forefathers opposed the principle of discriminating duties, which they nevertheless adopted to serve the people's interests. Republicans, at least, profess to believe in the principle of discriminating in favor of American products that are subject to foreign competition. Our land industries are powerful and influential enough to secure Republican adherence to that principle, an influence that our maritime interests lack, and which may therefore be safely disregarded.

Since those stirring statements I have quoted were so valiantly uttered the tonnage of ships entering our seaports from ports from foreign countries has more than doubled, and the value of our foreign commerce is two and one-half times as great as 1896. For every additional ton of American shipping that has entered 18 foreign tons have entered.

And the protection of American shipbuilders alleged in the opening sentence of the Massachusetts discriminating duty declaration was nothing, in fact, but a hollow sham. It was based upon the denial of American registry to foreign-built American-owned vessels. In the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, the right of American register is granted to foreign-built American-owned ships, and in the 20 months that law has been in operation not one foreign ship has been placed under American register, which proves that American register possesses no value in our foreign trade. It had a value when our laws, both in import duties and in tonnage dues, favored ships under American register, laws that were suspended more than 60 years ago. Then our shipbuilders were protected. But with the suspension of those discriminatory laws the protection ceased. Foreign ships now enjoy every privilege under our laws in American foreign trade that American ships enjoy. And foreign ships are free from the fatal disadvantages that ships under American register are subject to in foreign trade. Naturally, in such circumstances, the American owner of a foreign ship under a foreign flag keeps her there.

For 50 years a certain class of Americans have contended that the solution of the American shipping problem would be found in the free admission of foreign vessels to American register—that if American citizens were permitted to buy ships wherever they could be bought most cheaply, regardless of where they were built, there would be so large an accession of cheaper-built foreign ships to our registry as to give them the carriage of the larger part of our foreign commerce. That beautiful theory has "taken the count" since the Panama Canal act was passed.

The advocates of "free ships" have been so dumfounded and so deeply chagrined at the utter failure of their "cure-all" remedy for the ills suffered by American shipping that they actually propose to retrieve themselves by throwing open the domestic trade of the United States to foreign vessels. This will be the crowning infamy in the long list of legislation that has driven American ships from foreign trade—to destroy the last remnant of American maritime interests, shipbuilding and shipowning, by turning our domestic carrying over to ships built by foreign shipbuilders.

One time there was a humane Dutchman who noted that his more pretentious neighbors had had the tails of their dogs cut off. It was the fashion to have tailless dogs. Now, this Dutchman wanted to be in the fashion, but he didn't want to hurt his dog—he didn't want to hurt it any more than was necessary to give the dog the badge of aristocracy, to make his mongrel fashionable. And so, in the goodness of his heart and in order not to inflict too much pain upon his dog, he cut off his tail an inch at a time, so as not to hurt it too much. Now, that is the humane manner by which Congress proposes to go about the destruction of American shipping in domestic trade—an inch at a time "won't hurt so much." My idea of the way the thing will be done is this: First, foreign-built American-owned vessels will be admitted to what is called "the coast-to-coast trade"; that is to say, the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States. Next, foreign-built American-owned vessels will be admitted to the trade between the United States and Alaska, and Hawaii and Porto Rico; and finally the whole coast trade of the United States will be thrown open to foreign-built American-owned ships. As soon as that policy begins, our people will cease to have any vessels built in the United States. Our shipyards will go into bankruptcy, and such warships and Government vessels as are hereafter required may, for a time, be built in such of our navy yards as may be adapted for such work. Presently all Government vessels that are not war vessels will be built abroad, because foreigners will build them more cheaply than American builders, and finally we will either give up the idea of having any more warships or an American Navy or else the enticements of greater cheapness of foreign construction will induce our Government to have its warships built abroad, like Turkey and China have theirs built.

After that it will only be a short step to the admission of foreign vessels under foreign flags to any part of our domestic carrying. The question will be properly asked, Why not, if it is right to permit foreign vessels to engage in it? The idea is that foreign ships do our foreign carrying more cheaply than our ships could do it, and that, therefore, it is economically advantageous for us to let foreigners do it. This is not the real reason foreign ships do our foreign carrying, but it is the popular belief. If it accurately stated the case, however, and it should transpire that foreign ships could do our domestic carrying more cheaply than our American ships could do it, why should not the same reasons for allowing foreign ships to do our foreign carrying suffice for allowing them to do our domestic carrying?

That is precisely what we are coming to. It is intended that eventually ships built in foreign countries, of foreign materials, by foreign workmen, owned, officered, and manned by aliens, shall do our domestic carrying.

Of course this will probably be done gradually on the theory that it won't hurt so much as if done all at once. We shall end up by being fashionable, even if we get at it only an inch at a time.

During the many years that foreign ships—chiefly British—have been engaged in driving American ships out of foreign trade, our domestic carrying, this suddenly discovered "monopoly," was being permitted to do it all with American ships. The foreign ship was busy getting possession of our foreign trade, and its owner was not working to secure our domestic carrying. But of late years the foreigner has gone as far as he seems able to do in our foreign carrying, but he isn't content to remain satisfied at that—not at all. He now aspires to do our domestic carrying, and he is very likely to succeed. I think you are entitled to some proof that this danger is imminent, and the proof is really so abundant that one is perplexed as to which he will choose. Our present commissioner of navigation was appointed to that office by President Cleveland 21 years ago, and long acquaintance with him enables me to say, and I am pleased to say, that he is a man of exceptional ability and attainments. In his annual report of three years ago—1911—he discusses the Panama Canal tolls question a great deal more fully than I have any idea of doing to-night, and he takes this position: That foreign nations will probably reimburse their ships for the tolls they pay in passing through the Panama Canal, and that if tolls are levied upon American vessels and not repaid to them by the Government, American ships will achieve the very unique distinction, in time, of being the only ships that use the Panama Canal that themselves pay for using it. With that explanation I want to quote a little from his 1911 report to the Secretary of Commerce, as follows:

"If they are named as the sole American direct contributor to the cost of the canal, the conclusion will be inevitable that Congress has decided definitely for some years to come that shipping must shift for itself, regardless of consideration which may be shown to other industries, for a tariff can not be framed without intentional or unintentional favors.

"The present statutory reservation of the coasting trade between Atlantic and Pacific ports to American vessels will not alone suffice to create the shipping needed for the coasting trade through the canal, for that reservation could not be regarded as longer secure in the face of a decision by Congress to select American navigation alone to bear the direct burden of supporting a canal military in its first great purpose and for the general welfare in its second. Only the most venturesome capital would trust itself to shipbuilding and shipowning for canal purposes. This hesitation is already noticeable, compared with foreign preparations for the use of the canal. If it shall continue, the canal will be opened to business confronted with insufficient American shipping to carry any large volume of miscellaneous trade between our Atlantic and Pacific coasts, except between New York and San Francisco and Hawaii. Unless American ships from the time the canal is open to trade are forthcoming in adequate numbers to carry on satisfactorily the trade between numerous ports on the two coasts, a demand wellnigh unanswerable will arise from both coasts for the admission of foreign-built ships to this trade, either under their own flags or under the American flag by registry.

"A deliberate conclusion to tax directly American shipping for the canal points to an ultimate surrender of shipbuilding. Already confined almost wholly to our own coasts, American shipping under the taxing proposition will have a diminishing share in canal trade as it now has in foreign trade."

The Commissioner of Navigation said a great deal more, equally pertinent, but this serves to give some of his argument. You can understand very clearly that, even although for nearly a century our laws reserved the carrying between American ports to American vessels, and although for 20 months it has been declared that American coastwise vessels may pass through the canal free of tolls, that if there is serious danger of cheaper foreign vessels being admitted to the carrying between our coasts, and if tolls are to be charged after all, those radical changes would tend to seriously upset whatever calculations shipowners might make based upon existing law. And that is precisely the position American shipowners are placed in. Existing law invites them to build for the canal for domestic trade. But if they do build for domestic trade, depending upon a continuance of existing law, and the law is radically changed to their injury, it might actually ruin them. And if they hesitate to build enough vessels because of these threatening dangers, and it should transpire that more traffic should offer than there were domestic vessels available in which to carry it, the very dangers that are dreaded would be likely to encompass them—a case of being damned if they do and damned if they don't.

Quite a number of bills are pending in Congress to admit foreign vessels to our coastwise trade, some more drastic than others, and there is a growing sentiment in Congress to destroy the "monopoly" now enjoyed by American vessels in our domestic trade. The second act of the First Congress in 1789 imposed a tax of 50 cents a ton on foreign vessels engaging in our domestic trade for every time they entered an American port, and 6 cents a ton once a year on American vessels in coastwise trade. That drove foreign vessels out of our domestic trade. But in 1817 it was provided by law that foreign vessels should not carry cargoes between American ports. No one now alive is in any way even remotely responsible for those early laws, sanctioned by Washington and Hamilton, Madison and Jefferson, which gave to American vessels this "monopoly," first, by discrimination by law, and later by direct prohibition by law as regards foreign vessels. Since then, for Americans to engage in our domestic trade they have been compelled to have their vessels built in the United States at a cost considerably higher than they would pay if the ships were built abroad, and the cost of running ships in our domestic trade under the American flag is very much higher than the cost of running foreign vessels under foreign flags. You will be able to see, therefore, how a change in the laws would admit much cheaper foreign vessels to our coast trade, vessels much more cheaply operated than our vessels, would affect ours.

About a year ago Chairman ALEXANDER, of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives, said to me: "The admission of foreign-built vessels to the coastwise trade of the United States I regard as the most imminent danger now confronting the maritime interests of the United States." We had been talking about the failure of the free-ship provision of the Panama Canal act, and he had told me that he had been personally assured by a member of the leading American shipbuilders that they did not object to the admission of foreign vessels to American registry for foreign trade. I was greatly amazed, and I said so, and I asked him how he explained it. His reply to that was that when a man is confronted with the immediate necessity of a major operation he is but little concerned with the possible danger of a minor operation only remotely possible. What he meant by that was this: For a dozen or more years American shipbuilders have ceased to build ships for foreign trade, except in the rarest instances. All the ships built for our foreign trade, in fact, are foreign built, and run under foreign flags. So the American shipbuilder figures that he will not be seriously hurt by being positively barred from the building of ships for foreign trade when he is already barred, to all intents and purposes, from building for that trade. But his existence as a shipbuilder rests upon his being able to build for domestic trade. If foreign vessels are admitted to that, the effect will be to put our shipyards out of business, except for the flimsiest and smallest kind of vessels, vessels that can not be transported across seas. And it is precisely that danger that a year ago the chairman of the committee of the House of Representatives to whom maritime matters are referred told me he believed was the most imminent danger that confronts American maritime interests.

If Chairman ALEXANDER was right a year ago, the time for the blow to fall upon our shipbuilders is just that much closer at hand than it then was. Every straw that was capable of indicating which way the wind was blowing with respect to the sanctity of our domestic shipping has indicated its violations through the admission of foreign-built vessels; all of the tendencies of the times and all of the indications in and about Congress point unerringly that way. It is one of the things that is "on the cards."

The scenery has all been painted, the settings are all made, and the stage is almost ready for the curtain to rise. The actors have all carefully memorized their parts and they are now ready to act them. For a hundred and twenty-two years almost no objection has been made to the reservation of our domestic carrying for American vessels. There has been no charge during those 122 years that it is a "monopoly"; but during the past 2 years it has suddenly been discovered that the vessels engaged in our domestic carrying constitute a "monopoly." Is it not somewhat singular that it is only during the past two years that we have become aware that this is a "monopoly"? As the time draws near for its destruction we shall learn more and more clearly, what we have been too dull to realize for a century and a quarter, that not only is our domestic shipping a "monopoly," but it is an odious, a grasping, greedy, insufferable "monopoly." Adjectives will multiply until we regard this "monopoly" with horror. We have been told that its agents have haunted the halls of Congress, attempting to shape legislation, but there is no proof. Presently no one will want proof; everyone will want this "monopoly" crushed. Then we shall learn, in fact we are already learning, that the only effective way to crush it is to admit foreign vessels to compete with it. If you want to destroy a thing, discredit it. Owners of ships in domestic trade are charged with seeking to obtain by stealth a "subsidy" that they could never openly obtain. Exemption from tolls is now popularly defined as "a masked subsidy," a "disguised subsidy." Since the foundation of the Government Congress has appropriated $791,000,000 for river and harbor improvements, for construction of canals and locks, and no vessel has even been taxed a dollar for using them. It is not yet charged that the vessels that use our improved rivers and harbors, our canals and locks are "subsidized." If necessary, though, to sustain the growing belief that exemption from Panama Canal tolls is a "subsidy," why exemption from tolls for using our other rivers and harbors, locks and canals will be also called a subsidy. The free use of highways made at public expense and bridges built at public expense we shall soon learn give a subsidy to those that use them when they are exempted from tolls. The ruthless purpose is to discredit our domestic ships, because the time is ripe to destroy them.

CONFLICTING VIEWS.

It doesn't matter that shipowners have never asked for exemptions from tolls at Panama in either coastwise or foreign trade; they must be charged with "secretly plotting and scheming to secure exemptions," which means subsidy. Our weak, impoverished, unorganized, vacillating, and divided shipping interests must be held up to public view as a monstrous thing, stuffed and coated with money, and greedily and insatiably seeking more. The people must believe that it is a dangerous "monopoly" seeking a "bald, naked, shameless subsidy"—nothing else will fill the bill.

After that picture of our domestic shipping interests has been held up to public gaze long enough and the people are thus able to see for themselves that this is a "monopoly seeking a subsidy" and that therefore there no longer is doubt of it, that will be the time to introduce St. George, the dragon slayer, and quite willing, you may be sure, George will be to slay this unspeakable monster. If a new "monopoly" grows up in place of the old one, and it happens to be a British monopoly, our domestic carrying may then forever feed and fatten it, because then things will be as they should be—as it is now intended they shall be.

In a speech delivered in the United States Senate only last week by Senator TOWNSEND of Michigan, he saw the handwriting on the wall, and read it aright. He said:

"The only shipping monopoly is that which is engaged in our foreign trade, floated in foreign bottoms, flying foreign flags, and over which our Government has no control. The only merchant marine of which our country can boast is that engaged in our domestic commerce, and some Senators would destroy that by admitting to our coastwise traffic, without let or hindrance, the merchantmen of England and of other countries, and that policy will soon be urged by foreign sympathizers after the pending action is taken; indeed, it is now urged by some. What is our coastwise merchant marine to which free passage of the canal is now given? It is the fleet of boats built, owned, and operated in the United States and under laws enacted by Congress. They must be built in American yards according to regulations assuring healthful, sanitary conditions. They must be manned by American seamen, who are paid American wages. Such of them as are suitable can be secured by the United States in case of war. They furnish competition with the railroads, and thereby do more to secure reasonable transportation rates than all the efforts of railroad commissions, State or national. When the canal tolls bill was before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals it was shown by competent witnesses that the wages paid to employees on boats flying the American flag was 4 to 10 times the wages paid on foreign boats. It was further shown that combinations clearly in restraint of trade existed among foreign ship companies and that none existed among American shipowners."

Just a fortnight ago I had the pleasure of addressing the Haverhill Board of Trade on this subject, and I pointed out to them what the conduct of our foreign commerce involved in dollars and cents. There are 7,000,000 tons of ships, worth $500,000,000, now doing our foreign carrying. The ordinary life of a modern ship is computed at 20 years; so, during the next 20 years existing tonnage will be replaced by 7,000,000 tons of new ships, costing $500,000,000; and if our foreign commerce increases as rapidly in the next 20 years as it has in the past 20 years, another 7,000,000 tons, worth $500,000,000 additional, or 14,000,000 tons of ships, worth a billion dollars will be engaged in our foreign carrying. To-day the ships in our foreign trade earn $350,000,000 in freights, passengers, mails, and express; insurance on cargoes and hulls costs $125,000,000 more; and the exchange on the money used in buying our $4,278,000,000 worth of foreign commerce probably costs $50,000,000—say that the conduct of our foreign commerce now costs $500,000,000 annually, and that 20 years from now it will cost a billion of dollars a year, or an average of $750,000,000 a year, a total of $15,000,000,000 in 20 years.

Fifteen billions of dollars! That is what the conduct of our foreign commerce is likely to cost the United States in the next 20 years. If we owned the ships that did our foreign carrying, that $15,000,000,000 would be paid to us, and remain in the United States. We would have the 14,000,000 tons of ships and the $15,000,000,000 at the end of 20 years. If foreigners own the ships, they will receive the $15,000,000,000, so that at the end of 20 years we shall own neither the 14,000,000 tons of ships nor the $15,000,000,000. Our foreign commerce will have enriched our foreign rivals and we shall be $15,000,000,000 poorer than we need be. In time of war perhaps a considerable portion of the foreign tonnage will be used against the United States—our present commercial rivals will grow rich in times of peace and be fortified in merchant ships, trained and experienced seamen, for the national defense in time of war, while we shall remain weak upon the seas. This is why foreign nations pay their merchant ships in subsidies, subventions, bounties on navigation and construction, naval-reserve retainers, and in other ways upwards of $50,000,000 a year largely to capture and to hold our foreign carrying.

But what is $50,000,000 a year to the nations whose ships earn $450,000,000 a year for the shipowners, insurance companies, and bankers of those nations? And all the while those nations have, as a reserve in time of need, those merchant ships and their officers and men to draw upon for the national defense. You see, that $50,000,000 a year in subsidies, subventions, bounties, and the like, constitute an insurance to the nations that pay it.

So much for our foreign trade. And now as to our domestic trade. The United States Census Bureau only occasionally takes a census of the total tonnage of vessels in the United States and we have an undocumented tonnage of vessels that average 600 tons each not mentioned in the annual statistics of our documented tonnage, and by documented I mean the vessels that are recorded at our customhouses. The two last censuses that disclosed the total tonnage in the United States were taken in 1889 and in 1906, respectively. In 1906 there were 37,321 vessels, of 12,893,429 gross tons, valued at $507,973,121, with a gross income of $294,854,532, employing 140,029 men, to whom were paid $71,636,521. These vessels carried 265,545,804 tons of freight and 366,825,663 passengers. There was a great increase over 1899. Applying to the 20 years succeeding 1906 the same percentage of growth as during the preceding 17 years, the merchant marine of the United States in 1926, documented and undocumented, would be over 21,000,000 tons, valued at $863,600,000, whose annual earnings would amount to $589,709,064. It is the vast domestic shipping of the United States to-day that gives this country second rank among maritime nations, as we have a bare million tons of ships in foreign trade, and these will disappear rapidly, probably, and be replaced with foreign ships.

Let me tell you that the only reason we have a shipping in foreign trade even worth speaking of is because of an ocean mail subsidy act, passed in 1891, and so weak and inconsequential in operation as not to have been repealed. And yet, during the 22 years that preceded its enactment, there was no increase in our steam tonnage in foreign trade, while during the succeeding 22 years American steam tonnage in foreign trade increased three and one-half fold, from 200,000 tons to nearly 700,000 tons. When the existing ocean mail act is repealed our steam shipping will disappear from foreign trade.

Do you think that the foreign shipping interests, that exert such a powerful influence at Washington, will permit that ocean mail act, that gives a modicum of encouragement to American shipping in foreign trade, to much longer remain upon our statutes? Do you think that the foreign shipping interests that have decreed the destruction of our domestic shipping will allow anything to remain upon our statutes that in the least degree helps to sustain our tonnage in foreign trade? No, no; it is on the cards to destroy American shipping in foreign and in domestic trade, root and branch. It is a shipping that too strongly menaces the maritime supremacy of the nations that covet the carrying that it now does, and let me tell you how.

I have spoken of the time-honored policy under which the domestic carrying of the United States has been reserved for American ships—from the time of Washington and Adams, Jefferson and Madison. Each time the United States has acquired new territory, like Louisiana, Florida, Texas, California, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, the domestic navigation laws have been extended to the trade between the United States and these new possessions. Three times our domestic navigation laws were extended to the trade with the Philippines, and three times it was postponed, the last indefinitely. But in respect to all other trade between the United States and its possessions, contiguous or noncontiguous, its carrying is confined by our navigation laws to American vessels.

When our navigation laws were extended to our trade with Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico it necessitated the building of precisely the same kind of ocean-going vessels as are built for foreign trade for this new domestic trade. This was disquieting enough to the foreign maritime nations that had almost completely driven our ships out of foreign trade—to find us coming back, as it were, into possession of ocean-going ships, for domestic carrying. It created uneasiness, because a menace to foreign shipping domination was growing up here. The number of vessels engaged in our domestic trade—the enrolled vessels of the United States—have increased but about 2 per cent since the Spanish-American War, but their tonnage has increased 75 per cent, and this is as true of our vessels on the Great Lakes as of those on the coasts. Now, with the opening of the Panama Canal, the opportunity for the building of large numbers of additional ocean-going ships in the United States for the carriage of our coast-to-coast trade has very greatly increased. If unchecked, this can have but one result—we shall presently begin the building of ocean-going ships for foreign trade again. What before was an annoyance now becomes an actual menace to the foreign shipping intrenched in our foreign carrying. Do you wonder that the foreign shipping interests, so influential at the seat of our Government, have determined that now is the time to destroy American shipping in all trades, before it realizes the danger that confronts it, before it can prepare to fend off the assault?

ARGUMENTS THAT CONTRADICT.

And this explains all of the dreadful and horrible things that we have so recently learned regarding our domestic shipping—that it is a monopoly, and that it is seeking a subsidy through tolls exemption at Panama. We are learning, too, that there will be no appreciable reduction in freight rates through the Panama Canal between our Atlantic and Pacific coasts. We are told that the remission of $125,000 a year in tolls on a 5,000-ton ship making 10 round trips through the canal would not affect freight rates a particle—that it would only enrich the shipowner just that much more. The whole theory of economics is upset to sustain the ridiculous and illogical position of those who can not and will not see any benefit to American domestic commerce through the opening and use of the Panama Canal, who insist that they see in it merely a means for further enriching the monopoly that now controls our domestic carrying—that is to say, American vessels. We are told that it will be the policy of the ships that run between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States to merely cut the transcontinental rail rates sufficient to fill their ships with cargoes—no more.

Then we shall be told that the only way to break this monopoly will be to admit foreign vessels to competition with domestic vessels in this coast trade, because foreign ships will be able to carry cargoes for so much less than American ships will do it. You might think that there was a high moral standard that owners of foreign ships live up to that American owners of ships ignore. If American ships will not substantially reduce their freight rates between the coast, what assurance have we that foreign ships will do so? If it is the practice of all carriers, whether rail or water, to tax commerce "all that the traffic will bear," how will the admission of foreign vessels to our coast-to-coast trade remedy matters one particle?

It is pointed out that foreign ships can carry so much more cheaply than American ships do that the cheaper foreign ships will capture all of the lumber trade between the two coasts. That is to say, it will be British Columbia lumber, and not Washington, Oregon, and California lumber, that will be brought to our eastern markets; that foreign ships will be able to carry from British Columbia to ports of the United States, and by barring them from carrying between Washington, Oregon, and California ports and eastern ports of the United States there will be no new business for the Pacific coast.

One might think that owners of American vessels were vampires, that would suck the last drop of blood from the people of the United States, and that owners of foreign vessels are angels of light who could under no circumstances whatever be persuaded to take any advantage of American shippers; that the sole hope of American shippers lies in the admission of foreign vessels to our coast-to-coast trade; that despair will seize upon our shippers if our coastwise navigation laws are not changed; that shippers will derive no benefits from the opening of the Panama Canal unless foreign vessels are admitted to the coast-to-coast trade. The unspeakable villainy contemplated by the monopolistic domestic vessel owners is only equaled by the unimpeachable honor and integrity of foreign vessel owners. It is actually to such depths of depraved and ridiculous reasoning that the implacable enemies of American shipping are willing to descend, in the belief that the American people will be completely humbugged by them.

We have given up almost all of our foreign carrying to foreign vessels, and what have they done to it? So monopolistic has been their methods that for three years the Federal courts of the United States have been taking evidence presented by our Department of Justice against foreign vessel owners whom our Government charges with violating the antitrust laws of the United States, and which these foreign vessel owners claim they are not amenable to. And the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives spent two years in investigating the foreign rings, pools, combines, and conferences that control foreign carrying, not alone of the United States, but of the world. And it is to these ruthless violators of our antitrust laws, these combines, pools, rings, and conferences of foreign shipowners, that we are asked to turn over our domestic carrying to save it from our domestic "monopoly."

This is the way Senator WESLEY L. JONES, of Washington, in a speech last September in the Senate of the United States, described the foreign shipping monopoly that now controls the foreign carrying of the United States and seeks to gain control of the domestic carrying of the United States as well:

"Trusts, combinations, pools, and conferences have been established, and through these rates are controlled, territory distributed, and business apportioned. Certain lines are given a certain territory; a certain number of ships are allotted to certain ports and the number of voyages limited, and they dare not exceed them under severe penalties arbitrarily but effectively enforced; freight rates are fixed and uniform; passenger receipts are pooled and distributed according to definite agreements; shippers are restricted to certain lines and certain ships on penalty of not being able to secure any shipping facilities whatever; rebates are given on condition that shippers will use no other lines; discriminations are practiced toward certain interests, and especially toward great combinations and powerful interests like the Standard Oil, the Steel Trust, and the International Harvester Trust; 'fighting ships' are maintained for the sole purpose of crushing and driving out of business any independent lines of ships; and the development of the markets and trade of their respective countries is very naturally favored as against our own."

That is what now controls our foreign carrying; it is to that combination that we must at present look to seek out foreign markets for our increasing surplus of manufactures; it is upon such ships, so controlled and dominated, that we must depend to hold these foreign markets for our exports; and it is to those ships and combinations and pools that we must look for the enlargement of the foreign markets of the United States, so that as our surplus products increase we shall be sure of a foreign market for their absorption.

Don't you think we would better depend upon ships of our own to search out and to find and to hold and to develop foreign markets for the growing surplus products of the United States, rather than to trust-controlled foreign ships that deny that our Federal courts have any jurisdiction over them, ships that may at will abandon our trade and leave us without the means of carrying our exports to foreign markets?

And don't you think that before we turn over our domestic carrying to such a graceless and merciless combination of foreign ships we had better pause? Have the foreign ships deserved the foreign carrying of the United States that we have allowed them to absorb? Does the record they have made in foreign trade justify our turning over to them our foreign carrying?

We need merchant ships of our own, their experienced and trained masters, officers, and seamen, as a resource of defense, a secondary reserve for our Navy—we need them for cruisers, troop ships, colliers, ammunition ships, hospital ships, repair ships, dispatch boats, and for a great variety of uses in time of war—they and the trained and experienced men that navigate them. Other nations are paying $50,000,000 a year to make sure that they shall have merchant ships, their masters, officers, and seamen, whenever they require them. Is there any nation that is more exposed to invasion from sea, more exposed to attack from the sea, than the United States? Not one. Our foreign commerce ranks third among the nations of the world, and our domestic commerce far surpasses that of any other nation. Shall we not hold our domestic commerce for our own ships, as we have always held it? Is the policy that we have steadfastly and unwaveringly held to in respect to our domestic carrying to be given up now? And is it to be given up to foreign ships that are absolutely and completely controlled by a world-encircling monopoly such as I have described? Are we to pay for the building of 14,000,000 tons of foreign ships in the next 20 years, and pay them $15,000,000,000 for the conduct of our foreign commerce, and remain weak upon the sea, where we need to be strong, for the national defense? I ask you to very seriously think it all over.

Mr. JONES. I also submit a letter written to me by Mr. A. R. Smith, as follows:

THE CITIZENS' NEW YORK HARBOR IMPROVEMENT COMMITTEE,
New York, April 18, 1914.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Ever since in 1854 Great Britain ostensibly threw open her coastwise carrying to the ships "of all the world" her people have covetously, greedily, intently kept their eyes fixed upon the coastwise carrying of the United States. They intend to have it, and they are likely to have it. They thought the United States would at once follow their magnanimous (?) example 60 years ago and throw open its coastwise carrying to the ships of "all the world," when translated into understandable English intended to mean British shipping. In the course of 60 years foreign shipping has captured a fraction of 1 per cent—only a fraction of 1 per cent—of British coastwise carrying. That Britons regard as ample justification for their capturing all but a fraction of 1 per cent of the coastwise carrying of the United States, and there are not a few Americans (?) who share that view.

So far nothing has interrupted the steady growth of the domestic shipping of the United States along the coasts and upon the Great Lakes. By the time the new Welland Canal is completed our domestic carrying will have been thrown open to foreign—merely another name for British—carrying, and foreign—that is to say, British—shipping will supersede American shipping upon the Great Lakes, just as it has in foreign trade. By that time foreign—British—shipping will have absorbed the great bulk of our coast carrying. What Britons started out to accomplish 60 years ago they are likely to succeed in accomplishing before the final adjournment of the Sixty-third Congress.

Have you noticed that since the Frye "ship-subsidy bill," otherwise known as the ocean mail act, of 1891, went into effect that the average proportion of the foreign commerce of the United States carried in American vessels has been just 10 per cent—no more? That seems to be, but it is not as far as foreign (British) shipping is able to go in driving American ships out of foreign trade. Because, when the full iniquity of that "subsidy" act of 1891 dawns upon the minds of the antisubsidists in and out of Congress, and it is realized that the "honor" of the Democratic administration is involved in its "repeal," since that party is so resolutely opposed to all subsidies, it must be manifest to you that the Frye subsidy bill of 1891 will follow the inexorable course of everything mundane and walk the plank. Then the remaining 10 per cent of American foreign carrying, so long and so audaciously—indeed, so iniquitously—enjoyed by American ships, will follow the other 90 per cent, and foreign shipping will then have considerately "relieved" American ships of any further concern or interest in American foreign carrying. Having, however, reached a sort of a "check" 20 years ago in the delightful pastime of chasing American ships from foreign carrying, the insatiable appetites of Britons were but whetted to undertake the overthrow of an odious and detestable "monopoly"—that engaged in the coastwise carrying of the United States. At that time the people of the United States did not realize, indeed, they were quite unconscious of, the "monopoly" in domestic carrying they had coddled and preserved by law since 1817; in fact, since 1789. The "monopoly" which George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, and Alexander Hamilton all thought it desirable to create—the reservation of our domestic carrying for domestic carriers—and which has remained, in fact, almost a century and a quarter unnoticed and unopposed, it is now proposed to destroy. And it is "on the cards" to have its destruction play directly into the astute but insatiable British maw, a maw that but grows greedier upon what it feeds. The first step in the direction of destroying this "monopoly", this odious and iniquitous monopoly, is to discredit it in the minds of the American people. That accomplished, its destruction merely awaits the pleasure of the executioner.

The Spanish-American War for a time interrupted the plans of driving American vessels out of our domestic carrying. Indeed, the United States even went so far as to "extend" the coastwise laws of the United States to its trade with Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. But when it was similarly proposed to "extend" the coastwise laws to the trade with the Philippine Islands, and even provided for two or three times, each time the time for such "extension" going into effect was "postponed," the last time indefinitely. Thus our trade with the Philippines, contrary to the trade of the United States with all of its other noncontiguous possessions, is not "coastwise," but, on the contrary, it is foreign; that is to say, British.

The extension of the coastwise trade of the United States to its overseas possessions necessitated the building in the United States of ocean-going ships for its carriage, the building, in the United States, of precisely the same type of vessel that is used in foreign carrying. Now, when Great Britain reached what she had regarded as the end of the building of ocean-going vessels in the United States, for the United States to resume the building of ocean-going vessels for domestic carrying was a piece of impertinence as insulting as it was alarming to "the mistress of the seas." Why, if that should be tolerated, the first thing we knew ocean-going ships would be building in the United States for foreign trade, and Great Britain would have her work to do all over again—that of driving American ships out of foreign trade.

Perhaps you may not have noticed that you would have to go back to 1886—think of it, 1886—a matter of 27 years, to find a year when the tonnage of American vessels in foreign trade was as great as it was in 1913. Do you think Great Britain intends to tamely submit to that? If you do think so, it only goes to show that you don't know Great Britain.

And if you want to find a year when American ships in foreign trade carried as valuable a part of the foreign trade of the United States as it did in 1913, why you have to go back to the year 1861—a matter of 52 years. Now, you know it is "straws that show which way the wind blows." This development has been insidious, and it is probable that that Frye ocean mail "subsidy" act of 1891 is the real cause of it. Should you longer wonder at the fate of the Frye ocean mail "subsidy" act of 1891? The eyes of the world are being opened to the fact that the United States is in the grasp of a hideous coastwise "monopoly," and an ocean mail "subsidy." Can the antisubsidy administration and its virtuous followers in Congress too quickly purge the United States of these iniquities? Well, I should say not. Watch them. If they loiter at all in accomplishing the work, why there is Great Britain, and her good friends in the United States, always ready and willing to stimulate their efforts by the mention of "monopoly," which will cause the raising of one foot, and then "subsidy," which would cause the raising of the other, and thus progress will be assured.

I don't suppose that you have noticed, either, that the "enrolled" tonnage of the United States—the substantial vessels in domestic trade—which was very little greater in 1898, the year of the Spanish-American War, than it was in 1865, has almost doubled in the years that have succeeded 1898? Well, it is so. Mind, I didn't say that the number of vessels had doubled, because they have increased only 2 per cent, but the tonnage has increased about 80 per cent. You see what that means, don't you? It means that the 80 per cent increase in the tonnage of our domestic, or, rather, our "enrolled," vessels has been largely due to the necessities of the trade of the United States with its noncontiguous possessions. It may surprise you to know that that same trade of the United States to-day, with its noncontiguous possessions, has only been exceeded in value a half a dozen times during all of the years that preceded 1843.

And then along comes this Panama Canal, again requiring—who knows how many—ocean-going "domestic" vessels for its conduct. If Great Britain was incensed before, she is outraged now, and clearly her partisans, in and out of the United States, show it. She and they are justly indignant. The situation is intolerable. Just to think, when Great Britain had succeeded in driving American ocean-going ships off the seas, that they should sneak into existence through "domestic carrying." What a travesty on "domestic carrying." Of course such domestic ships are a "monopoly," and of course they are seeking a "subsidy" in the way of exemption from Panama Canal tolls. Of course they are disgraceful. Isn't it plain that the suspicions of the American people have been pretty thoroughly aroused regarding this "domestic monopoly"? What wonder, then, that Members of Congress are daily introducing bills for the admission of foreign—that is to say, British—vessels to our domestic carrying? Is it not about time to apply the "snickersnee" to the throat of this monstrous "monopoly," lest it grow to proportions that Great Britain wot not of?

You see, it is this way: By insisting that our coastwise vessels pay tolls for passing through the Panama Canal Great Britain realizes, even if we do not, that it will have a tendency to increase freight rates between the coasts. The people on both coasts—very gently, but insidiously, assisted—are beginning to realize that freight rates between the coasts will not be as low as they had anticipated, and the more tolls can be made to put them up the better for the scheme working overtime just now. Now, what is the best way to make freight rates between the coasts as low as it is possible to make them? Government regulation of our coastwise carrying? Not at all. The establishment of a Government-owned line of ocean-going steamships precisely adapted to the needs of our coast-to-coast trade? Possibly. But the "sure" way to get the rates to the minimum and to keep them there, of course, and the only sure way, is to admit foreign—which means British—ships to the trade. There would be no doubt of it then. Now, that is what we are going to be told more and more as the days go by and as the free-ships-in-coastwise-trade bills increase in Congress. You see, if foreign vessels can be admitted to the trade between the coasts, then the strongest argument for exempting coastwise vessels from tolls will have been destroyed. Then it would be a discrimination in favor of such foreign (as well as American) vessels as engaged in coastwise trade, a discrimination not to be permitted as to American, however tolerable it may be as regards Panama or Colombia, vessels.

So it must be clear to you that before this domestic Frankenstein is permitted to grow to any larger "monopolistic" proportions we shall have to call upon "St." George to kill the "dragon" by putting his ships into the trade. While that would be the end of the maritime interests of the United States—lock, stock, and barrel—it would also be the end of the "monopoly" this country has harbored lo these 124 years.

Just in passing it might be proper to remark that Great Britain will not care who writes our Declarations of Independence, so long as she with her ships is permitted to do our carrying, foreign and domestic. If it grows into a "monopoly" under the "red ensign," won't it be a holy one?

Respectfully, yours, A. R. SMITH.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, few questions have arisen upon which there has been such a diversity of opinion as the Panama tolls problem. At the same time scarcely any question in our political history has been so fully and widely discussed. On both sides are arrayed men of national reputation, and it must be acknowledged that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty admits of honest differences of opinion. However, before proceeding with my argument, I wish to lay down a proposition of law indorsed by eminent jurists of international reputation and confirmed by the statement of one of our ex-Secretaries of State. It is an admitted fact that the United States exercises actual sovereignty over the Canal Zone, which we acquired by virtue of our treaty with Panama in 1903. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Wilson v. Shaw (204 U. S., 33), decided that the sovereignty of the United States over the Canal Zone is the same as over any other part of the United States, and this same concession was made by Great Britain in her second note of protest.

SOVEREIGNTY CAN NOT BE LIMITED BY IMPLICATION.

It is an unquestioned legal principle that any provision of a treaty aiming to restrict the sovereign right of a nation must be clear and explicit, and any nation desiring to interpret a treaty so as to limit the sovereign attributes of another nation must prove its case beyond possibility of doubt. The sovereign rights of a free and independent State are not to be curtailed by any forced, doubtful, or even plausible interpretation of a disputed clause of a convention between nations, but the limitations to be imposed must be clearly and unequivocally authorized in the most positive manner by the treaty in question. In this connection let me quote from Mr. J. Hannis Taylor, who states, in his great work on International Law, page 397:

"As it will not be presumed that any State desires to divest itself of its sovereignty, its property, or its right of self-preservation, no such result can be established by implication. It must be clearly expressed."

The eminent British jurist, Mr. William Edward Hall, whose work marks an epoch in the development of international law in England, says in his book on this subject, page 166:

"If a dispute occurs between a territorial sovereign and a foreign power as to the extent or nature of rights enjoyed by the latter within the territory of the former, the presumption is against the foreign State, and upon it the burden lies of proving its claim beyond doubt or question."

ENGLAND'S CONTENTION A DEROGATION OF OUR SOVEREIGNTY.

Let us apply this well-established principle to the Panama tolls dispute. By denying our right to exempt our own vessels from tolls England and those who advocate her view are endeavoring to limit the sovereign rights of the United States over our own American vessels passing through an American canal dug through American territory at an enormous cost in money and the sacrifice of hundreds of American lives. It follows, then, logically that if England wishes to curtail our rights she can not base her contentions upon a disputed clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which has been so variously interpreted by men of the highest character and great learning both here and in Europe, but she must prove her case beyond cavil or question. I can not emphasize this point too strongly. According to the principles enunciated by the most eminent American and British authorities on international law, the burden of the proof lies upon England and those who take her view, since she is attempting to restrict the sovereign rights of the United States. If England has acquired any rights by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in derogation of our sovereignty, those rights must be clearly and unambiguously expressed, else the presumption is that they do not exist.

This idea is so well expressed by Mr. Philander C. Knox, Secretary of State under President Taft, in a statement published in the Washington Post on May 11, that I can not refrain from quoting his exact words:

"The principle of international law governing a claim in derogation of sovereignty being that no treaty can be taken to restrict the exercise or rights of sovereignty unless effected in a clear and distinct manner:

"First, let us look at the facts. The United States paid to Panama $10,000,000 for the zone itself; we have agreed to pay to Panama a yearly annuity of $250,000 forever; we paid to the French Panama Canal Co. $40,000,000 for its rights in the Isthmus; we are building the canal at a total expenditure of about $400,000,000; we alone are to meet the $25,000,000 which it appears to be now proposed to pay Colombia; we alone are expending untold millions necessary to fortify and protect the canal so that some belligerent, eager to secure the resulting advantage, may not destroy it; we alone are bearing the risk of losing all this investment as the result of some natural cataclysm, such as an earthquake, against which no human agency can secure us; we alone have stood for whatever of criticism has come from the manner of acquiring the Canal Zone—a criticism encouraged and fostered by the very class which now seeks to turn over to Europe as a gratuity the benefits of our action; we alone have put the lives of the flower of our Army engineers and of thousands of American citizens through all the hazards and dangers of fatal tropic maladies; and, finally, no other country has shared and does not propose to share one penny of this expenditure or any phase of any risk connected with our stupendous undertaking. Surely upon these facts there arises no necessary implication that Great Britain is entitled to the benefits of this colossal work on the same and identical terms as we, the owners, the builders, the operators, the protectors, and the insurers of the canal, or that she shall dictate how we shall treat matters of purely local national trade and commerce, or that we shall be denied the very rights in respect to our domestic commerce which she herself claims and exercises and which every other nation in the world possesses."

I now quote the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in full and invite its careful perusal:

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

"The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

"The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

"And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States;

"Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

"ARTICLE 2.

"It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

"Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance in the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ARTICLE 4.

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

"In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and hereunto affixed their seals.

"Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and one.

"JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
"PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]"

One of the principal debatable points in paragraph 1, article 3, of the treaty is the phrase "vessels of commerce and of war."

It has been asserted by gentlemen favoring the repeal of the tolls exemption for our coastwise vessels that the expression "vessels of commerce" included all vessels of the United States, both those engaged in foreign and domestic commerce. Such is not my opinion.

OUR COASTWISE COMMERCE ALWAYS FOSTERED.

Coasting trade in maritime law is defined as "commerce and navigation between different places along the coast of the United States, as distinguished from commerce with ports in foreign countries." And "vessels plying coastwise are those which are engaged in the domestic trade, or plying between port and port of the United States, as contradistinguished from those engaged in the foreign trade, or plying between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country."

Ever since the close of the Revolutionary War our American coastwise shipping has been especially favored. While for some years after the war foreign vessels were not absolutely excluded from our domestic traffic, this was merely for the sake of convenience, in order to give our own ships time to become naturalized, as it were, and to get out American papers, since before the war they were registered as British vessels. Even at that time, however, heavy duties were exacted from foreign ships that should engage in our coastwise trade, and, practically speaking, it was restricted to American vessels.

In 1817 a law was passed prohibiting any but American ships from engaging in the coastwise trade. The law has been religiously observed since its enactment nearly 100 years ago. Under the terms of this statute no foreign vessel has ever been allowed to carry any merchandise or other commodities from one American port to another; and though our once large marine engaged in the foreign trade has constantly diminished, until now only 9 per cent of our foreign commerce is carried in ships floating the Stars and Stripes, and the flag of the Union is rarely seen in the foreign ports, except on one of our naval vessels or the pleasure yacht of some millionaire, we have developed a splendid fleet of coastwise vessels, which ply our rivers and canals, the Great Lakes, the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific, moving enormous volumes of freight.

Later we enacted section 158 of our navigation laws, which reads in part as follows:

"No vessel belonging to any citizen of the United States, trading from one port within the United States to another port within the United States, or employed in the bank, whale, or other fisheries, shall be subject to tonnage tax or duty if such vessel be licensed, registered, or enrolled."

By this we specifically exempted our coastwise traffic from all tonnage charges in our ports, while our foreign commerce and the commerce of other nations must pay a tonnage tax of 2 to 6 cents per ton.

In 31 treaties of commerce and navigation made with foreign countries between 1825 and 1887 we have made special mention of our coasting trade, since it is a universally prevailing custom among nations to distinguish between vessels of a nation and vessels of a nation engaged in foreign commerce. It will thus be seen that not only have we made special and favorable provisions for our coastwise traffic in our maritime laws, but in treaties with foreign nations we have also treated it separately. The presumption is, therefore, that coastwise vessels were not included in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, because no mention of them was made, and that the expression "vessels of commerce" did not include our domestic vessels.

FAMOUS COURT DECISION.

In proof of this I submit the decision of the Supreme Court in the well-known case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332).

The second article of the treaty of commerce and navigation of 1815 with Great Britain is as follows:

"No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States, nor in the ports of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels."

Surely the expressions "British vessels" and "vessels of the United States" are as comprehensive and sweeping as "vessels of commerce" in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It happened that at this time there was a Texas statute, article 3801 of the Revised Statutes, which provided that, among others, "all vessels of 75 tons and under, owned and licensed for the coasting trade in any part of the United States, when arriving from or departing to any port in the State of Texas" should be exempt from compulsory pilotage charges. Article 3800, however, provided that all vessels not exempted, which, of course, included vessels of the United States engaged in foreign commerce and vessels of foreign nations, should be forced to pay a pilotage charge on entering or departing from any port of Texas. In other words, the statute exempted our coasting trade from certain pilotage charges, but imposed these charges upon foreign vessels. It was contended by a British captain that this statute was in direct violation of our treaty of 1815 with Great Britain, and the case went to the Supreme Court of the United States.

There Mr. Justice White, now Chief Justice, delivered in part the following opinion:

"Nor is there merit in the contention that as the vessel in question was a British vessel coming from a foreign port the State laws concerning pilotage are in conflict with a treaty between Great Britain and the United States providing that no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States. Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage resulting from the law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign." (Olsen v. Smith, 195 U. S., 344.)

This decision was rendered on November 28, 1904, and Great Britain has given tacit consent to this interpretation of "vessels of the United States" and "British vessels," since during the 10 years now elapsed she has not protested against the judgment of the Supreme Court. If, then, coastwise shipping is not included in the expressions "vessels of the United States" and "British vessels," how can it logically be said to be included in the much-disputed phrase "vessels of commerce"?

The essence of the decision of the Supreme Court is the fact that "such exemption does not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in such trade."

Since, by law, American vessels are the only vessels that can engage in our coastwise traffic it is hard to see how we are discriminating against anyone in exempting them from tolls. Discrimination necessarily implies some one that is discriminated against, and since none but American vessels can engage in our domestic traffic, who is it that is discriminated against?

By the terms of the statute of the United States that I have already quoted American coastwise traffic has been exempted from tonnage charges for nearly 100 years, while a charge of 2 to 6 cents per ton is imposed upon all other vessels, including English ships. Great Britain has never asserted that this was a discrimination or that it violated the treaty of 1815.

ROOSEVELT SAYS TOLLS EXEMPTION NOT DISCRIMINATION.

Ex-President Roosevelt says, in a letter to The Outlook under date of January 18, 1913:

"I believe that the position of the United States is proper as regards this coastwise traffic. I think that we have the right to free bona fide coastwise traffic from tolls. I think that this does not interfere with the rights of any other nation, because no ships but our own can engage in coastwise traffic, so that there is no discrimination against other ships when we relieve the coastwise traffic from tolls. I believe that the only damage that would be done is the damage to the Canadian Pacific Railway."

He might have added, "and some railways in the United States."

"Moreover, I do not think that it sits well on the representatives of any foreign nation, even upon those of a power with which we are, and I hope and believe will always remain, on such good terms as Great Britain, to make any plea in reference to what we do with our own coastwise traffic, because we are benefiting the whole world by our action at Panama, and are doing this where every dollar of expense is paid by ourselves. In all history I do not believe you can find another instance where as great and expensive a work as the Panama Canal, undertaken not by a private corporation but by a nation, has ever been as generously put at the service of all the nations of mankind."

To summarize then: From the universal practice of our Nation as exemplified in our maritime laws for nearly 100 years, and in our treaties of commerce with foreign nations, and from the fiat of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is evident that the expressions "vessels of commerce" and "vessels of coastwise trade" do not include each other, that they are not synonymous, and that they each have a distinct meaning of their own. It follows, then, that "vessels of commerce" in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not include our coastwise vessels, and that therefore we are at liberty to exempt them from tolls if we so desire. As a clinching argument let me quote the language of Great Britain in her note to our State Department of July 8, 1912:

"As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken."

CONSTRUCTION OF SENATORS WHO RATIFIED TREATY.

In order to arrive at the meaning of the language of the treaty as construed by the Senate, one of the necessary parties to it at the time of its ratification, let us consider the facts in regard to the Bard amendment, offered when the first draft of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was being considered by the Senate in 1900. In order to prevent any doubt on the subject of our coastwise traffic, Senator Bard proposed the following:

"The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade."

This amendment was defeated by a vote of 43 to 27. The proponents of repeal insist that this vote favors their construction, as it seems to make square issue on the point in controversy, but an analysis of the opinions of the Senators who participated in the treaty debates shows exactly the contrary. And the views of Mr. Roosevelt and these Senators must be accepted as the correct American construction of the treaty at the time of its ratification, for they were its joint authors and makers.

Senator LODGE, acting chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, who had charge of the treaty during the illness of the chairman, Senator Davis, and who is now advocating the repeal of the tolls on economic and other grounds, said in the Senate on July 17, 1912:

"Mr. LODGE. * * * The question of canal tolls has arisen in connection with representations made by the Government of Great Britain in regard to our rights in fixing tolls. It so happened that I was in London when the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made, and, although the draft was sent from this country, that treaty was really made in London and should properly be called the Lansdowne-Choate treaty. I mention this merely to show that I had some familiarity with the formulation as well as the ratification of that treaty. When the treaty was submitted by the President to the Senate it so happened that I had charge of it and reported it to the Senate.

"The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as Senators will remember, embodied in substance the amendments which the Senate had made to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. England had refused to accept those amendments, and then the second treaty was made embodying in principle all for which the Senate had contended.

"When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the phrase 'all nations.'"

"Mr. LODGE. While I am on my feet, if the Senator will allow me, there is one other thing I should like to say. I said in my remarks a few days ago that my personal view was that we had the right to exempt American vessels from tolls. I did not go into the matter. I took a somewhat active part in the two Hay-Pauncefote treaties, as they are called. I voted against the Bard amendment. I voted against it in the belief that it was unnecessary; that the right to fix tolls, if we built the canal or it was built under our auspices, was undoubted. I know that was the view taken by the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, who was at that time chairman of the committee. I certainly so stated on the floor. * * * I had that same view in regard to this treaty. I was familiar with the work that was done upon it in London at the time when it was concluded there and finally agreed to, and I was very familiar with it here. Although, as the Senator from Georgia correctly said, the question was not raised at that time, I personally have never had any doubt that the matter of fixing the tolls must necessarily be within our jurisdiction; and when I referred to our going to The Hague as useless I did not mean because our case was not a good one. I meant because in the nature of things we could by no possibility have a disinterested tribunal at The Hague. It would be for the interest of every other nation involved to prevent our fixing the tolls according to our own wishes.

"Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

"The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

"Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

"Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Massachusetts has just expressed a reason for his vote against what was known as the Bard amendment. Can the Senator inform us as to whether that was the general sentiment prevailing at that time among the Senators?

"Mr. LODGE. I can only say, Mr. President, that that was the view of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it was my view; and, while I may be mistaken, I think on that vote the majority of the Senate followed the Committee on Foreign Relations."

The same idea expressed by Senator Lodge is affirmed by Senators Foraker, Butler, Perkins, Bard, Scott, Wellington, Clapp, Turner, Dubois, Deboe, Kearns, Towne, Mason, Beveridge, Gallinger, Warren, Dillingham, and Burrows, 19 in all, who are a unit in the support of our right of exemption.

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 17, 1912, I quote the following:

"Mr. CLAPP. In answer to the suggestions of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], I will say that I think it was quite generally understood then that the reason for voting down the proposition to authorize the fortification in express terms was that under the treaty we had the right to fortify without that particular provision. I know I was here at the time, although I do not recall all of the speeches. But while some of us voted insisting in some instances that these things should be explicit and in others voting with the majority upon the ground that they were covered anyhow, I believe, both with reference to the coastwise trade and especially with reference to the question of fortification, that many of the votes cast against those express provisions were cast upon the theory that without them we nevertheless had the right to do them.

"Mr. O'GORMAN. That the provisions were unnecessary?

"Mr. CLAPP. Yes; that they were unnecessary."

During the recent debate on the Panama tolls a number of Senators who voted on the Bard amendment have expressed themselves concerning the construction they placed upon it, as follows:

Hon. Thomas R. Bard (ex-Senator from California):

"When my amendment was under consideration it was generally conceded by Senators that even without that specific provision the rules of the treaty would not prevent our Government from treating the canal as part of our coast line, and consequently could not be construed as a restriction of our interstate commerce, forbidding the discrimination in charges for tolls in favor of our coastwise trade, and this conviction contributed to the defeat of the amendment."

Hon. Albert J. Beveridge (ex-Senator from Indiana):

"When the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under discussion several Senators gave as reasons for voting against Senator Bard's amendment that it was unnecessary, because under the treaty, even as it then stood, we had a perfect right to exempt our coastwise shipping from payment of tolls.

"I voted for Senator Bard's amendment, not because I had any doubt upon the subject, but because the fullest possible American rights over the canal could not be stated too strongly for me.

"When the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty came up for consideration, so unanimous was the opinion of Senators that under the treaty our right over tolls was undoubted that Senator Bard did not even propose or offer his amendment again. Instead, he himself voted for the resolution advising the ratification of the treaty without amendment, which carried almost unanimously. This second Hay-Pauncefote treaty is the one now under consideration.

"From my recollection of the matter, I think it certain that the Senate would not have advised ratification if it had been seriously contended that the treaty denied us the right to favor our own coastwise vessels."

Hon. Fred T. Dubois (ex-Senator from Idaho):

"I was a Member of the Senate at the time of the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and voted for its ratification. I recall the consideration of the treaty and the debate, and I entertained no doubt as to the meaning of the treaty. I did not myself, and I do not believe that my colleagues, generaly speaking, understood that this treaty in any way deprived the United States of the right to favor its coastwise trade or deprive it of what I consider the sovereign power to deal with its domestic commerce. In my opinion, had any such view prevailed the treaty would have been rejected."

Hon. Charles A. Towne (ex-Senator from Minnesota):

"I remember distinctly my own feeling about the matter at the time, which was that we retained under the treaty full sovereignty over the canal and over the incidents of its ownership and control, including the right to fortify and police it and to regulate its use by vessels of commerce, subject only to the condition that all other nations should be treated alike; and that this was the general understanding."

Hon. Thomas Kearns (ex-Senator from Utah):

"I am in thorough accord with the views of Senators Lodge, Bard, Clapp, Perkins, Davis, and others, and, was I fortunate enough to be a Member of the Senate at the present time, I would certainly support the idea of favoring our coastwise trade. I think it is a piece of imposition on the part of Great Britain to attempt to dictate what, if anything, we should charge for canal tolls to our own war vessels, transports, or coastwise ships. We built the canal with our money. We have a right to protect our own property and to use it for our own convenience, and I do not think we should be bound otherwise by any treaty obligations, except to give all foreign nations fair and just treatment, without discrimination, as one against the other."

PERSONAL LETTERS TO ACTORS IN DRAMA.

I wrote personal letters to all the Senators who voted on the Bard amendment who are living and had not expressed themselves, and, with the exception of two, those who replied said, in substance, that as they understood the treaty at the time it was before the Senate for ratification the United States had a perfect right to regulate its coastwise traffic as it saw fit, and that the idea conveyed by the Bard amendment in express terms was implied in the language of the treaty as finally adopted. Several of them stated in unequivocal language that such was the general understanding, and that the treaty would not have been ratified if it had been understood otherwise. I quote briefly from these letters as follows:

Ex-Senator Julius C. Burrows, of Michigan:

"At the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under consideration in the Senate and as finally ratified it was my understanding and belief that under it the United States would have the right to exempt its coastwise vessels from the imposition of all tolls. Without such exemption, express or implied, the treaty could never have been ratified."

Ex-Senator Marion Butler, of North Carolina:

"The treaty would never have been ratified if there had been any doubt about our right, not only to exempt our coastwise vessels from paying tolls, but also to do anything and everything with reference to the canal that we saw fit, so long as we permitted other nations observing the rules laid down to use it on terms that were equal and fair to all. * * * It was also emphasized that the privilege which we granted to all nations to use the canal was a conditional privilege and limited to their compliance to these conditions, and that, therefore, we reserved the right to enforce these conditions or rules against other nations, and that there was no one else to enforce them but us, the builder and owner of the canal."

Senator J. H. GALLINGER, of New Hampshire:

"When the so-called Bard amendment was before the Senate I voted against it specifically and absolutely on the ground that I believed it to be unnecessary, holding to the view that under the treaty as it stood we had an absolute right to exempt our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. No other construction could properly be put upon the treaty unless we reached the conclusion that the Panama Canal is not an American waterway."

Senator W. P. DILLINGHAM, of Vermont:

"Replying to your note of inquiry as to my attitude toward the amendment offered by Mr. Bard to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty proposing to specifically exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, permit me to say that it was urged by most of those who participated in the debates that the proper construction of the treaty rendered the adoption of such an amendment unnecessary. I inclined to that opinion, and as the adoption of the amendment would have resulted in an undesirable postponement of the ratification of the treaty, I voted against it."

Ex-Senator George Turner, of Washington:

"The spokesman of the Foreign Relations Committee assured the Senators when the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under consideration that that treaty plainly implied what the Bard amendment explicitly provided, and hence that the Bard amendment was unnecessary. My recollection is that I accepted that view as correct, but voted for the Bard amendment out of excess of caution and to foreclose any possible contention on the subject. * * * Some Senators were more apprehensive than others of specious but untenable contentions to be put forth by Great Britain in the future, and that apprehension was the occasion of the Bard amendment and of the support it received in the Senate."

Ex-Senator William E. Mason, of Illinois:

"I voted for the Bard amendment allowing coastwise trade, because when I first took up the question I thought it ought to go into the treaty, but upon examination of the question I became convinced that our coastwise and interstate business was not properly a subject to be managed by treaty, but that under the Constitution Congress alone could make laws regarding interstate commerce. And when, a year later, the matter came up the amendment was not even offered, as I remember it, because it was stated definitely, not once but many times, in executive session, that the question of the management of our coastwise trade was a matter for the people to determine on in the future."

Ex-Senator William J. Deboe, of Kentucky:

"I voted against said (Bard) amendment because I believed the United States had the authority and right to fortify and regulate tolls of the canal without the amendment to the treaty. This was the general view of Senators at that time, and even by many who voted for the amendment. It was fully discussed by Senators in secret session. It was stated frequently that if the United States constructed the canal at its own expense it should have the authority and right to regulate tolls."

Ex-Senator G. L. Wellington, of Maryland:

"I voted against the amendment solely for the reason that I considered it entirely superfluous, being firmly of the opinion that the treaty plainly provided for the exemption of our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls; that the Bard amendment was merely a repetition of what had already been set out in the treaty itself. I could not conceive for a moment that anything else was intended; if I had, I certainly would have voted against the ratification of the treaty. * * * I am convinced that this was the feeling of those who voted for the ratification of the treaty—not only those who voted for it, but those at the head of our Government at that time."

Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS, of California:

"Senator Davis, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, claimed that the treaty in no way interfered with our vested rights in regard to the coastwise shipping of the United States, and that the Bard amendment merely conveyed in explicit language, as you state in your letter, what was already plainly implied. At the time of the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was decided that it was unnecessary to so definitely set forth in regard to the exemption of coastwise vessels, and it was conceded by everyone that we had a perfect right to exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls if we desired to do so."

Ex-Senator J. B. Foraker, of Ohio:

"I remember clearly how I viewed the Bard amendment and why I voted against it. There were two grounds for my objection. The first, that the United States, being the owner of the canal, with all the rights of ownership, would have authority to do with respect to her own vessels in the matter of tolls whatever she might see fit to do. Therefore it was unnecessary to amend the treaty to authorize our Government to exempt from tolls any class of our vessels. * * * The second ground was that to specify that coastwise vessels might be exempted was to impliedly stipulate that vessels engaged in foreign commerce could not be exempted. * * * I did not at the time when the treaty was ratified regard the provision found in article 3, to the effect that the vessels of 'all nations' should be allowed to use the canal on terms of entire equality, as a limitation on the power of the United States."

Senator FRANCIS E. WARREN, of Wyoming:

"The amendment proposed by Mr. Bard * * * was rejected because it was held by a substantial majority of the Senate that the treaty itself did not contravene or restrict the right of the United States to regulate and manage the canal in the matter of charges for traffic in favor of coastwise vessels."

Ex-Senator Nathan B. Scott, of West Virginia:

"I voted against this (Bard) amendment because I thought under the terms of this treaty we had the right to exempt our coastwise vessels if we so desired. I thought the Bard amendment superfluous."

NO MORAL QUESTION INVOLVED.

These opinions from the actors in the drama, from the men who helped to make the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, who certainly must have understood what they were doing when they ratified it, show clearly that our coastwise commerce was not included, nor intended to be included, in the words "vessels of commerce." Every one of these men, and especially Senator LODGE, agree in thinking that the United States has a perfect right to legislate in regard to her coastwise vessels as she sees fit, although Senator LODGE, and perhaps some of the other gentlemen, may, on economic or other grounds merely, believe it unwise to give free passage through the canal to these vessels.

The much-mooted proposition that we have no moral right to exempt our coastwise shipping from tolls does not appeal to these Senators and ex-Senators who helped to make the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and without whose ratification it would never have existed. Moreover, a great many other eminent Americans agree with them and deny most emphatically that there is any moral question involved. Does anyone believe that such men as CHAMP CLARK, OSCAR UNDERWOOD, JAMES R. MANN, and VICTOR MURDOCK, who have been the unquestioned leaders of their respective parties in the House of Representatives for many years, and whose qualifications as honorable men none can deny, would have voted and labored hard against repeal if it involved moral turpitude and the violation of national honor?

Is it conceivable that Senator STONE, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and an earnest advocate of repeal, would have stated in his recent speech in the Senate: "I was fully convinced in my own mind that the United States had the right under the very terms of the treaty itself, and without violating either the letter or spirit of that convention, to allow our coastwise vessels to pass through the canal free of tolls. * * * That was my conviction in 1912, and it is my conviction to-day," if there was any moral turpitude involved?

If we have no right to do it, would Senator O'GORMAN, whose stainless life and great reputation as a jurist of New York's highest court for many years has been an honor to his countrymen, favor anything which is a national dishonor? If we had no moral right to pass the exemption act in 1912, it is passing strange that a large number of the ablest and best men in the Senate and House are opposing repeal with all their might. Such a thought is monstrous. None of these men could be induced to do a dishonorable thing, and if we are morally bound by the treaty not to exempt our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, then it is dishonorable in us to exempt them.

Moreover, the only two living ex-Presidents of the United States, Roosevelt and Taft, are both opposed to the repeal of the tolls-exemption act, and both strongly of the opinion that we are not precluded by the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty from handling our domestic commerce in our own way. Mr. Taft in his annual message to Congress, December, 1912, said:

"After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on the vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty."

And last, but not least, no Democrat ought to say that our grand old party in its last national platform, which appealed so strongly to the American people that they swept us into complete power in government, would have solemnly declared in favor of "exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal" if there were anything dishonorable or contrary to moral right in such a doctrine.

"ALL NATIONS" DOES NOT INCLUDE UNITED STATES.

Without attempting to enter upon a full and detailed discussion of the subject, I wish to call attention to certain facts in regard to the interpretation of the words "all nations observing these rules." At the very outset there is an obvious and necessary distinction to be drawn between the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that was submitted to the Senate February 9, 1900, and the second revised draft, that was finally ratified November 18, 1901. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty provided for a joint protectorate to be exercised by the United States and Great Britain over the canal, by which they guaranteed to preserve and maintain a "general principle" of neutralization and adopt certain rules as the basis of such neutrality, which all other powers were to be invited to adhere to.

In the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty the idea is completely changed. In this treaty the United States alone, without Great Britain, "adopts" certain rules, upon the observance of which the use of the canal shall be dependent. Upon examining the treaty from the viewpoint of common sense, it seems logical that when a nation which by the terms of the convention "shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal," "adopts," lays down, makes certain rules in regard to the neutralization and use of its own canal, that there is a presumption that these rules do not apply to itself, but were intended for all other nations. A careful examination of these six rules which are quoted above in article 3 of the treaty seem to preclude the idea that the United States is included in the term "all nations."

If "all nations" means all nations, including the United States, then we have bound ourselves not to use the canal if we commit an act of war in it; that our vessels of war shall not revictual in it, and can not remain under the protection of the fortifications we have erected at a cost of $14,000,000; that we shall not embark or disembark our own troops; that we can not replenish the magazines of our battleships with powder and shot and shell to fight the battles of our Nation; that if our ships are hard pressed by a victorious enemy they shall not remain in the canal, but shall be compelled to leave within 24 hours, and that the day after the departure of our defeated squadron the fleet of the enemy shall steam unmolested by our frowning fortifications, past the yawning mouths of our cannon, through an American canal, under the protection of the American flag, to resume the pursuit of American vessels, or it may be to ravage with fire and sword the coasts of our great Republic. Such a thought is preposterous.

In answer to this objection Great Britain says through Sir Edward Grey:

"Now that the United States has become practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government does not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection."

In other words, because we have secured sovereignty over the Canal Zone by virtue of our treaty with Panama, Great Britain contends that five of these rules—the five relating to belligerency—no longer apply to the United States, but that the first one remains in full force.

This is a distinction founded upon self-interest. It has no basis in fact. If it is a derogation of our sovereignty not to be able to exercise belligerent rights over the canal, then it is equally as much an invasion of our sovereign rights to say that we shall not treat our own vessels using the canal just as we see fit. If the last five rules do not apply to the United States, then it can not be said that the first one does apply. To say that we shall not pass our own vessels through the canal free of tolls is a clear derogation of our sovereignty. In my judgment it is evident that the expression "all nations" in rule 1 does not apply to the United States.

There is another reason that I wish to advance in support of the contention. If we assume for the sake of argument that "all nations" embraces the United States, then the sentence found at the end of rule 1, "Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable," is useless and almost meaningless. If our own ships and those of foreign nations were to be on a par in regard to the conditions and charges of traffic, would there have been any necessity to demand that such conditions and charges should be just and equitable? If the United States had been compelled by the terms of the treaty to impose identical tolls on our own vessels and those of foreign nations, would there have been any danger of her demanding from our own and foreign ships an excessive, exorbitant, or unjust charge? Would we have imposed any charges that would not have been just and equitable to our own citizens?

As soon as we admit, however, that "all nations" means all nations except the United States, the expression becomes perfectly reasonable and intelligible. Its purpose was to prevent us from discriminating between the other nations using the canal, such as between England and France, or France and Germany, and so forth.

A TREATY CAN NOT AFFECT COASTWISE COMMERCE.

Mr. President, I now wish to present a phase of this question which has not yet been fully discussed during the debates on this bill. It goes to the very root of the question, and I invite the careful attention of the Senate and especially of its constitutional lawyers to my proposition.

It is contended by most, though not all, of the advocates of the bill under consideration that we are in honor bound to repeal the exemption clause of the Panama tolls act of 1912, because we pledged ourselves in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to treat all commerce through the canal alike, and that if it is a hard bargain we must stand by it; that the laws of good morals and fair dealing between man and man and nation and nation compel us to comply with our solemn contract obligation.

Granting for the sake of argument that the contentions of the friends of repeal are true; granting that the framers of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did intend to include the United States in the expression "all nations," which, of course, I do not admit; granting that the purpose of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was that the vessels of other nations should enjoy perfect equality and identical treatment with the foreign and coastwise vessels of the United States; granting all this, I repeat for the purpose of argument only, I still contend that this treaty did not bind the United States, in so far as our coastwise commerce is concerned. In the argument here presented I shall assume that the claims of the opposition are correct, that the United States is included in the term "all nations," and that our coastwise commerce was intended to be regulated. Upon this hypothesis I shall argue.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides, among other things, that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." Article II, section 2, provides that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur" (and a treaty is a compact or agreement between the rulers of two or more sovereign and independent nations). It appears from a casual reading of these two sections that the power to regulate commerce between the United States and foreign nations is, at least to some extent, concurrent between Congress and the Executive assisted by the Senate. It also appears that the right to regulate commerce among the several States, commonly designated as interstate commerce, is vested solely in the lawmaking power composed of the House of Representatives and the Senate. It is unnecessary for the purpose of this argument to discuss fully how far the President can make a treaty with a foreign country to regulate our trade relations and other matters of interest to the United States and the other treaty-making nation, and it will be readily admitted that a treaty between the United States and Great Britain for the regulation of foreign commerce passing through the Panama Canal is within the treaty-making power; that so far as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty sought to regulate the commerce of Great Britain in its use of the canal, and to guarantee that its use should be on terms of exact neutrality and equality with that accorded to all other foreign nations, it was valid, because the President under the Constitution, with the assistance of the Senate, had the required authority so to contract on those points.

There is not a single word in the Constitution which gives to the President any power whatsoever to affect, control, or regulate commerce between the various States of the Union either by treaty or otherwise, that right being plainly and specifically granted to Congress by the aforesaid section 8. It must be presumed, therefore, that the President and the Senate, well knowing they had no right to contract in relation to domestic commerce, did not attempt to do so when making the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that it relates solely to foreign commerce.

ENGLAND HAS NO INTEREST IN OUR INTERSTATE AFFAIRS.

The slightest consideration of this subject will show how illogical it would be for a foreign nation to become a party to our purely domestic affairs. What concern has England with the regulation and control of movements of freight, or police or quarantine regulations, by rail or water or otherwise between New York and Chicago, for instance, or St. Louis and Memphis, or Birmingham and New Orleans, or Portland and San Francisco, all of which are internal, interstate, and domestic? If the President should attempt by treaty with England to control trade, police, or quarantine relations between any of those interior points, it would at once appear that England was entirely without interest, and it would seem absurd for her to attempt to participate in a contract in which she had not the slighest concern. If that be true as to trade between these points, does not the same reasoning apply to the purely domestic traffic along our coast, as Boston to New York, Philadelphia to Baltimore, Charleston to Savannah, Pensacola to New Orleans, New York to Galveston, Charleston to San Juan, P. R., Norfolk to San Francisco, Portland to Honolulu, or Seattle to Sitka, Alaska, all of which is just as much a domestic affair, though conducted in ships, as in the case of rail communications cited above, for the coastwise laws prohibit any foreign country from carrying or handling any of our coastwise commerce, and England can no more engage in traffic by ships between these ports than in railroad movements between the interior points.

ROOT'S ATTEMPT TO DIFFERENTIATE BETWEEN KINDS OF COASTWISE TRADE.

The distinguished Senator from New York in his very able address to the Senate on the 21st admitted in substance that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not include "real coastwise trade," and says: "I should not question the right to treat that in a different way from the great over-sea trade that goes through that canal." He attempts to draw a distinction between what he designates as coastwise trade and the great over-sea commerce. Let me quote his exact words:

"Now, sir, I do not doubt that coastwise trade, real coastwise trade, is a special kind of trade, standing by itself, quite unlike the great over-seas trade. All countries, as a rule, treat their coastwise trade with special favor; they charge reduced rates for the privileges it has in their ports; and if any such real coastwise trade, any of the trade that has been known to the laws and treaties and navigators and traders time out of mind as coastwise trade, or cabotage, were to pass through the Panama Canal, I should not question the right to treat that in a different way from the great over-seas trade that goes through that canal. But, Mr. President, the real gist of this discrimination is not the discrimination between coastwise trade, properly so called, and other trade. No real coastwise trade will go through that canal. It is a thousand miles and more away from our coast. The trade that goes through it will be real over-seas trade, carried on by great ships, making long voyages—in its nature the exact antithesis to real coastwise trade.

"The trouble with this discrimination is the kind of trade which is included in this statute. The great over-seas trade, the trade from New York to San Francisco; from Portland, Me., to Seattle; from Philadelphia to Hawaii; from Baltimore to Alaska, in great ships plowing two oceans, great over-seas trade, although beginning and ending in American ports, is included by our statute under the term 'coastwise' and has the benefit of this discrimination."

This statement when analyzed is found to be about as indefinite as that of Mr. A. Mitchell Innes, chargé de affaires for Great Britain, who said, in his note of July 8, 1912, addressed to the Secretary of State:

"As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken."

COASTWISE COMMERCE MEANS ALL TRADING BETWEEN UNITED STATES PORTS.

I fail to see the force or logic in these statements of Senator Root and Mr. Innes. By admitting that "real coastwise trade" through the canal is entitled to "special favor" Mr. Root acknowledges the crux of the contention and admits his case out of court. We are either entitled to exempt all of our coastwise traffic or none. It is most unreasonable to say that a vessel plying from New York to New Orleans could pass through the canal free because of its coastwise character or could receive other favors, but that a vessel from New York to San Francisco must pay tolls and be treated as a foreign vessel. When American vessels are chartered and licensed for coasting trade no reservation is made as to what ports they shall enter, except that they be ports of the United States as contemplated by our navigation laws.

By coastwise commerce we mean the movement of freight or passengers by water from one port of the United States to another port of the United States which is by law strictly confined to vessels of the United States. Whether the distance be 500 miles, as from Boston to New York, or 1,900 miles, as from Philadelphia to Galveston, or 4,657 miles, as from New Orleans to San Francisco, it is still coastwise commerce, and the same principle applicable to one attaches to the other.

COASTING LAWS VERY EXPLICIT.

Section 4347, Revised Statutes of the United States, reads: "No merchandise shall be transported by water, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, from one port of the United States to another port of the United States, either directly or by a foreign port, or for any part of the voyage, in any other vessel than a vessel of the United States."

Black's Law Dictionary defines "Vessels 'plying coastwise' as those which are engaged in the domestic trade, or plying between port and port in the United States, as contradistinguished from those engaged in foreign trade, or plying between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country."

The leading case on this subject is that of Huus v. New York & Porto Rico Steamship Co. (182 U. S., 392), from which I quote:

"The words 'coasting trade,' as distinguishing this class of vessels, seem to have been selected because at that time all the domestic commerce of the country was either interior commerce or coastwise between ports upon the Atlantic or Pacific coasts, or upon islands so near thereto and belonging to the several States as properly to constitute a part of the coast. Strictly speaking, Porto Rico is not such an island, as it is not only situated some hundreds of miles from the nearest port on the Atlantic coast, but had never belonged to the United States or any of the States composing the Union. At the same time trade with that island is properly a part of the domestic trade of the country since the treaty of annexation, and is so recognized by the Porto Rican or Foraker Act. By section 9 the Commissioner of Navigation is required to 'make such regulations * * * as he may deem expedient for the nationalization of all vessels owned by the inhabitants of Porto Rico on April 11, 1899 * * * and for the admission of the same to all the benefits of the coasting trade of the United States; and the coasting trade between Porto Rico and the United States shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great coasting districts of the United States.' By this act it was evidently intended not only to nationalize all Porto Rican vessels as vessels of the United States and to admit them to the benefits of their coasting trade, but to place Porto Rico substantially upon the coast of the United States, and vessels engaged in trade between that island and the continent as engaged in the coasting trade. This was the view taken by the executive officers of the Government in issuing an enrollment and license to the Ponce, to be employed in carrying on the coasting trade, instead of treating her as a vessel engaged in foreign trade.

"That the words 'coasting trade' are not intended to be strictly limited to trade between ports in adjoining districts is also evident from Revised Statutes, section 4358, wherein it is enacted that 'the coasting trade between the territory ceded to the United States by the Emperor of Russia and any other portion of the United States shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great districts.' * * * A provision similar to that for the admission of the Territory of Alaska was also adopted in the act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii (31 Stat., 141, sec. 98), which provides that all vessels carrying Hawaiian registers on August 12, 1888, and owned by citizens of the United States or citizens of Hawaii 'shall be entitled to be registered as American vessels, * * * and the coasting trade between the islands aforesaid and any other portion of the United States shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great coasting districts.'"

COASTWISE SHIPPING IS INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

If it was the intention of the framers of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to include in its terms our coastwise commerce taken in its broad, general sense of traffic in American vessels from one American port to any other American port, a construction which I do not admit, then it was beyond the power and authority of the President and the Senate to include such a provision, and to that extent the treaty was null and void ab initio.

Interstate commerce is defined by the courts in many cases as "transportation of freight and passengers from one State to another, or through more than one State, either by land or water." The law books and law reports are literally filled with cases in which the courts have settled, beyond question, that Congress is vested with exclusive power over interstate commerce. "Interstate commerce by sea is of a national character within the exclusive power of Congress" (122 U. S., 326). "The right of intercourse between State and State is not created by the Federal Constitution, but was found to be existing by that instrument which gave to Congress the power to regulate it." (9 Wheaton, 1.)

Indeed, it may be said that the necessity for proper regulation of interstate commerce was the principal cause which led to the convention which gave us our present immortal Constitution, and the court was entirely correct in saying that the right of interstate commerce preceded the Constitution.

TREATY-MAKING POWER LIMITED.

Jefferson's Manual of Parliamentary Practice (N. Y., 1876) page 110, says:

"To what subject the treaty-making power extends has not been defined in detail by the Constitution, nor are we entirely agreed among ourselves. (1) It is admitted that it must concern the foreign nations, party to the contract, or it would be a mere nullity, res inter alias acta. (2) By the general power to make treaties the Constitution must have intended to comprehend only those objects which are usually regulated by treaty and can not be otherwise regulated. (3) It must have meant to except out of these the rights reserved to the States, for surely the President and Senate can not do by treaty what the whole Government is interdicted from doing in any way, and (4) also to except those subjects of legislation in which it gave a participation to the House of Representatives."

It is clear and undisputed that the House of Representatives must participate in legislation on interstate commerce, and beyond question matters relating to it come under the exception stated in clause 4.

In construing the Constitution we must consider its provisions collectively and thereby determine if any of its expressed clauses are modified by other clauses or implications. In this instance the power of Congress to regulate foreign commerce is modified by the treaty-making power, but there is no modification of the exclusive power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

Story, Cooley, Pomeroy, and others state that the treaty-making power is not supreme in its right to destroy the powers of Congress. Pomeroy says in his work on Constitutional Law, page 567:

"But I think it is equally certain that a treaty would be a mere nullity which should attempt to deprive Congress or the judiciary or the President of any general powers which are granted to them by the Constitution. The President can not by a treaty change the form of government or abridge the general functions created by the organic law."

An excerpt from Wharton's International Law Digest, volume 1, page 36, section 131a, is quoted in John Bassett Moore's Digest of International Law, volume 5, page 170, which reads as follows:

"That a treaty can not invade the constitutional prerogatives of the legislature is thus illustrated by a German author who has given to the subject a degree of elaborate and extended exposition which it has received from no writer in our tongue. 'Congress has under the Constitution the right to lay taxes and imposts as well as to regulate foreign trade, but the President and the Senate, if the "treaty-making power" be regarded as absolute, would be able to evade this limitation by adopting treaties which would compel Congress to destroy its whole tariff system. According to the Constitution, Congress has the right to determine questions of naturalization, of patents, and of copyrights. Yet, according to the view here contested, the President and Senate, by a treaty, could on these important questions utterly destroy the legislative capacity of the House of Representatives. The Constitution gives Congress the control of the Army. Participation from this control would be snatched from the House of Representatives by a treaty with a foreign power by which the United States would bind itself to keep in the field an army of a particular size. The Constitution gives Congress the right of declaring war. This right would be illusory if the President and Senate could by a treaty launch the country into a foreign war. The power of borrowing money on the credit of the United States resides in Congress. This power would cease to exist if the President and the Senate could by treaty bind the country to the borrowing of foreign funds. By the Constitution, "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law"; but this limitation would cease to exist if by a treaty the United States could be bound to pay money to a foreign power. * * * Congress would cease to be the lawmaking power, as is prescribed by the Constitution. The lawmaking power would be the President and the Senate. Such a condition would become the more dangerous from the fact that treaties so adopted, being in this particular hypothesis superior to legislation, would continue in force until superseded by other treaties. Not only, therefore, would a Congress consisting of two Houses be made to give way to an oligarchy of President and Senate, but the decrees of this oligarchy when once made could only be changed by concurrence of President and of senatorial majority of two-thirds.'"

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MUST PARTICIPATE IN INTERSTATE MATTERS.

Mr. President, this makes a wonderfully clear statement of the proposition. If the President and the Senate in making the Hay-Pauncefote treaty took control of our coastwise commerce, as is contended by the proponents of this measure, then the House of Representatives, whose Members are subject to recall at much shorter intervals than the Executive or the Senate, and to that extent may well be said to recognize with corresponding readiness the demands of the people, was deprived of any participation in one of the most important matters of legislation and statesmanship ever enacted since the birth of our Republic.

The Panama Canal was not built by treaty but by act of Congress. The statute authorizing it originated in the House of Representatives, which has annually for 10 years originated the vast appropriations necessary to carry on the giant work. The House of Representatives may be justly proud of its participation in all canal legislation, and be jealous of its prerogatives; and I am surprised that we have had so little protest against this attempt on the part of the Executive and the Senate to deprive the House of one of its most cherished and important powers, the right to participate, as it has done since the formation of the Government, in all matters relating to our domestic commerce.

The following paragraph is quoted from Mr. Henry St. George Tucker's article in the North American Review of April last on the treaty-making power:

"In 1814 the treaty of Ghent, carrying provisions as to duties on goods imported from Great Britain, was transmitted by Mr. Madison, as President, to Congress, recommending to them to pass the needed legislation. President Grant followed the same precedent during his term, and in July, 1867, by vote of 113 to 43, the House asserted its prerogatives again. A similar question arose in the Ashburton treaty for the settlement of the northeastern boundaries between Maine and the British possessions, and Mr. Webster deemed it prudent to gain the consent of Maine and Massachusetts to the settlement. These instances—and there have been many others which could be cited—are sufficient to show that the treaty-making power is not supreme in the sense claimed by many of its advocates, but that, like all other powers enumerated in the Constitution, it must not be used for the destruction of others, but in mutual cooperation with all powers equally supreme in their spheres. Each must be used for the development of the Constitution in its true spirit and interest; it must work out its own destiny in accordance with the maxim Sic utere tuo ut non alienum laedas."

WE HAVE MORAL RIGHT TO EXEMPT OUR COASTWISE SHIPS FROM TOLLS.

Mr. President, I have demonstrated beyond any reasonable doubt that if the makers of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty intended to include our coastwise commerce in its provisions they were exceeding their authority and hence it is a nullity in that respect; that the opponents of repeal are not violating any solemn contract, as has been alleged so often during this debate, but are standing by their just and legal rights; that the House of Representatives, a coordinate and coequal branch of our legislative system, was not a party to this treaty and is not bound by it; and that until Congress has acted in a constitutional manner we have a perfect right, legal and moral, without the slightest violation of any plighted faith or obligation of any kind, to exempt our coastwise commerce from the payment of tolls through the Panama Canal.

COASTWISE EXEMPTION ECONOMICALLY WISE.

Having shown that we have the right on our side, that we can without violating any principle make this exemption, the question arises, Is it wise and proper to do so entirely regardless of the treaty? I contend we should exempt these ships from tolls, that we should treat our own coastwise commerce through the canal just exactly as we treat that on our internal waters, which is also coastwise commerce. Why should there be one rule for the interior commerce on our canals, rivers, and lakes and another for that on the Atlantic, the Gulf, the canal, and the Pacific?

We will have expended on the Panama Canal for its purchase, construction, fortification, maintenance, and so forth, by the time it is completed, about $400,000,000, and for the purposes of this argument I assume its cost to be that amount. As good husbandmen it behooves us, if possible, so to use this costly property as to give a reasonable interest on the amount invested, and gradually secure the return of the principal, though it matters little if the principal ever be repaid, provided a fair interest is obtained. In determining our profits from the canal, we must consider two separate and distinct things—military and commercial.

MILITARY VALUE OF CANAL.

The canal would not have been constructed but for the necessity of concentrating our Navy, separated as are our Atlantic and Pacific coasts by 12,000 miles of sea around Cape Horn. It was practically impossible to mobilize the navy of one ocean into the other, and if we were to become really effective as a naval power it was imperative either to construct a canal at the Isthmus, thereby permitting the passage of our war vessels from ocean to ocean, or to build and maintain two separate and distinct navies at enormous cost, almost double the cost of one effective navy when the Panama Canal is completed. We had a graphic and most exciting instance of the necessity of this canal during our struggle with Spain in 1898, when the battleship Oregon made its wonderful voyage from San Francisco around Cape Horn, passing from the breezes of California through the fiery blasts of the Equator on to the frozen regions to the south, where the decks were covered deep with snow, thence northward, again across the Equator, and on with never-ending speed to participate in the glorious Battle of Santiago. For days the people of America held their breath in suspense and deepest anxiety for the fate of this great ship, and though it made the voyage safely and bore a gallant part in the battle everyone felt that the strain was too much, the danger too great, ever to be undergone again, and that we must provide for a quick, safe passage for our vessels across the Isthmus.

When men speak of the cold economic argument in this case they must not forget that one of the most important reasons, if not the controlling one, for constructing the canal was not commercial, but military, and in arriving at a just appreciation of the economic benefits to be derived from it we must not forget to credit it with the enormous military advantages as well as the great financial saving resulting from a very much smaller and infinitely less expensive but much more efficient Navy. A single first-class battleship costs about fifteen millions, and one of our highest military authorities recently said that the destruction of the canal, from a military viewpoint, would be more injurious to us than the loss of 20 battleships, representing $250,000,000 to $300,000,000 of actual cost. Therefore it is fair to say that the military advantages of the canal, calculated purely in dollars and cents, are equivalent to the cost of constructing 20 battleships, $300,000,000, plus the cost of maintaining them, which is estimated by the Navy Department at about $900,000 per annum for each ship, $18,000,000 for the fleet, and an amortization fund sufficient to replace them as they become useless. In other words, this military advantage will easily amount to between twenty and thirty millions a year. But not alone this. By practically doubling the efficiency of our Navy the canal will be a measure of the most terrific effectiveness in the preservation of peace. The better we are prepared for war the less chance is there of any nation attacking us. Hence it is quite possible that in the future the canal may be the means of preventing us from being involved in a costly and bloody war.

CANAL A PAYING INVESTMENT.

The commercial benefits are approached from an entirely different angle.

According to the report of Prof. Emory Johnson on the Panama Canal Traffic and Tolls, page 208, the estimated coast-to-coast American shipping through the canal in 1915 will be 1,000,000 tons, and in 1925, 2,000,000 tons. American shipping carrying foreign commerce of the United States in 1915 is estimated at 720,000 tons, and in 1925 at 1,500,000 tons. Foreign shipping carrying commerce of the United States and foreign countries in 1915 will be 8,780,000 tons, and in 1925, 13,850,000 tons, or a total commerce in 1915 of 10,500,000 tons, and in 1925 of 17,000,000 tons. If no tolls are exacted on the coastwise shipping of the United States this would give a revenue of $11,400,000 in 1915 and $18,000,000 in 1925. It is the estimate of Prof. Johnson and also of Col. Goethals, builder of the canal (see hearings before House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in 1912, p. 411)—and I ask especial attention to this statement, because such an erroneous impression has grown up about the cost of maintaining and operating this canal in the military establishment—that the total cost of operating and maintaining the canal will be $4,000,000 per annum, to which is to be added the annual rental of $250,000 to Panama and about $950,000 a year for upkeep of the military establishment at the canal, which gives us a total annual expense for operation, maintenance, rental, and military establishment of $5,200,000. This is a very different sum from twenty-five to thirty million dollars annual expense, as many people have been saying. If we deduct this from $11,400,000 gross revenue in 1915, it leaves a surplus of $6,200,000 to be applied as interest on the cost of the canal, estimated at $400,000,000. In 1925 the gross earning, assuming that our coastwise vessels pass through free, will amount to $18,000,000. Deducting from this $5,200,000 for annual expenses, as above stated, we have net earnings of $12,800,000. Let us deduct from this $12,000,000, or 3 per cent on the $400,000,000 invested, and it leaves a balance of $800,000 to be applied to the sinking fund. These figures clearly show that during the very first year, without any charge whatsoever for our coastwise vessels, the earnings of the canal will pay all expenses connected with it and over 1 per cent interest on its cost, and that at the end of 10 years from the time of its opening it will be paying every cent of the annual cost of maintenance, plus 3 per cent interest, plus $800,000 to be applied to the retirement of the construction bonds. If we can be guided by the experience of the Suez Canal we may expect after 10 years from the completion of the canal to be paying out of the tolls collected on foreign commerce all costs of operation, maintenance, rental, and military upkeep, plus 3 per cent on the capital invested, plus a large annual amortization fund. It will be seen, therefore, if no economic credit be given to the military side of this case, the advantages of which are hard to calculate in money, though amounting to between twenty and thirty millions a year, as shown above, and none to the enormous saving in freight of at least $100,000,000 a year on transcontinental railroad rates, as appears later, the canal will pay handsomely as a purely commercial business proposition, even if all our coastwise vessels be permitted to use it free of tolls.

THERE IS NO COASTWISE MONOPOLY.

The statement has been repeatedly made on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere that our coastwise vessels are controlled by a shipping trust. The Alexander Report on Steamship Agreements and Affiliations has been quoted to the effect that 92 per cent to 94 per cent of our coastwise vessels are controlled by the railroads and two large shipping consolidations. The eloquent Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] on April 24, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 7760, stated, referring to this report, that "the names of all the companies and the agreements between the companies are printed, and the final conclusion is reached that, barring those ships controlled by the railroads, practically all the balance of the vessels engaged in coastwise transportation are controlled by two corporations."

It is inconceivable how this very able and usually accurate statesman has fallen into such egregious error and allowed his imagination to play such fanciful pranks with cold facts. He and others have sought to give the impression that the general public would receive no benefit from free tolls to our coastwise vessels, because they are so dominated by trust combines that there would be no legitimate competition; that the traffic would be charged every cent it could possibly bear, regardless of whether there were tolls or not; and that if tolls were remitted it would merely be an additional bonus to the already plethoric purses of the shipping octopuses.

I did not believe that these statements and the inferences therefrom were correct, but felt that the gentlemen who made them had fallen into honest error. I therefore gave the matter very careful study and investigation, and personally conferred with Dr. S. S. Huebner, who prepared the Alexander report, and Mr. George T. Chamberlain, Commissioner of Navigation.

In the Alexander report, page 369, in the chapter on steamship company affiliations on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, we find this statement:

"On this leading water highway of American commerce practically all the large regular steamship lines are either controlled by railroads or are subsidiaries of one of two large shipping consolidations—the Eastern Steamship Corporation and the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines. * * * The steamers of the railroad-controlled lines, combined with those of the Eastern Steamship Corporation and the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines, number 199, or 84.7 per cent of the above-mentioned total for the 28 lines, and represent 516,055 gross tons, or 93.9 per cent of the foregoing total gross tonnage."

This appears to be the origin of the assertion that our coastwise traffic is controlled by a shipping trust. At the very outset it is to be noted that this statement applies merely to the regular lines on our Atlantic and Gulf coasts and not to those on the Pacific coast. It can not therefore be applied to our entire coastwise shipping. On page 347 of the Alexander report Dr. Huebner says:

"Important independent steamship lines make a more prominent showing in the Pacific coast trade than in any other division of our coastwise or inland commerce, and, aside from the Alaskan and Hawaiian trades, no important consolidations of water carriers seem to exist. Unlike the situation in the Atlantic and Great Lakes trade, the railroads control only two important lines."

I took up with Dr. Huebner in person his statement regarding the domination of 94 per cent of the regular lines on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts by the railroads and two shipping combinations, and he told me that his assertion had been misquoted and misinterpreted on the floor of the Senate. It referred merely to the regular lines on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts and not to the enormous number of tramp steamers and other vessels not in the regular lines.

According to the report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1913, page 164, the total number of enrolled coastwise vessels on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including regular lines, tramp steamers, and so forth, was 8,389, their gross tonnage being 3,053,339 tons. Of the 8,389 vessels only 235 belong to the regular lines, and of the 3,053,339 total tonnage only 516,821 tons is comprised by these regular lines. Consequently, the tonnage of the regular lines constitutes only 18 per cent, or less than one-fifth, of the total tonnage, and of this one-fifth Dr. Huebner says 93.9 per cent, or 516,055 tons out of a total of 3,053,339 tons, is railroad or trust controlled. So much for the Atlantic and Gulf coasts.

Let us now examine conditions on the Pacific coast. The Report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1913, page 164, states that the total number of enrolled coastwise vessels on the Pacific coast, including regular lines, tramps, and all other ships, is 1,264, totaling 591,644 tons. According to the Alexander report, page 405, out of these 1,264 vessels 106 are owned by the regular lines, and of the 591,644 gross tons 350,512 tons belong to the regular lines. The question immediately arises, What per cent of the regular lines on the Pacific coast is railroad or trust controlled? On page 405 of the Alexander report we find that of the 350,512 gross tonnage of the regular lines only 172,670 tons, or 49 per cent of the total line tonnage, is dominated by the railroads or shipping combinations. Therefore the tonnage of the regular lines constitutes 59 per cent, or about three-fifths, of the total Pacific-coast tonnage, and of this three-fifths Dr. Huebner says 49 per cent is railroad or trust controlled.

To summarize, then, the total enrolled coastwise tonnage of the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts is 3,644,983 gross tons. Of this the regular lines make up 900,333 tons, which is not quite 25 per cent, or about one-fourth, of the total tonnage. According to Dr. Huebner, of these 900,333 tons comprised in all the regular lines combined, 688,725 tons, or about 76 per cent, are railroad or trust controlled. Therefore, of our entire enrolled coastwise tonnage of the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts, amounting to 3,644,983 tons, 688,725 tons in all are railroad or trust controlled, or only 19 per cent of the whole. This is quite different from saying that practically our entire coastwise traffic is dominated by railroads and shipping combinations. The remaining 81 per cent is independent, free to engage in legitimate competition for the business of the coasts and the canal, and the result must be very active efforts to secure commerce and very cheap freights.

FEW TRUST-CONTROLLED VESSELS WILL USE THE CANAL.

There is another phase of the question to be considered. The gentlemen who make the assertion that practically all our coastwise shipping is trust-controlled appear to take it for granted that as soon as the Panama Canal is completed all of our coastwise vessels will use the canal; that the regular lines will abandon their established routes where they are making money for the sole purpose of going through the canal.

Beginning with page 58 of part 3 of the recent hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, there is inserted a table prepared by Mr. Chamberlain, Commissioner of Navigation, entitled "Probable canal steamers," which gives a list of steamers that will probably use the canal. I discussed this table with Mr. Chamberlain, and at my request he wrote me, giving the reasons why certain vessels would use the canal and why those plying on established routes on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans would not use it. From this letter I quote:

"I think it quite unlikely that any considerable number of the steamship lines covered in the pages you mention (pp. 62–68) would abandon their present well-established routes to venture into the canal trade. For this reason the table I prepared under the direction of the Interoceanic Canals Committee was divided into two parts. The first (pp. 58–61) includes vessels which, in some instances are not unlikely to use the canal, if not regularly, at least on occasional voyages."

In the main, Dr. Huebner concurred with Mr. Chamberlain in believing that these ships would probably use the canal, and that those on well-established routes on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts would not use it. The ships now in use on the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts, which include regular lines, tramps, and so forth, that will probably use the canal total 470,000 gross tons. According to Dr. Huebner and Mr. Chamberlain, the trust-controlled vessels likely to use the canal aggregate 167,000 tons, or about one-third of the whole.

The trust-controlled vessels are those of the Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiaries, the Girard Trust Co., and another small company operating miscellaneous cargo steamers. Dr. Huebner stated positively that the Atlantic & Pacific Steamship Co. (Grace Line) and the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. were not dominated by the shipping combination, and in proof thereof referred to pages 184–187 and 363–365 of the Alexander report. The steamers of the Isthmian Canal Commission and the Panama Railroad Co. are Government owned. In regard to the miscellaneous cargo steamers or tramps, which Dr. Huebner had not investigated, Mr. Chamberlain expressed the opinion that none of them were trust controlled, with the exception of the Girard Trust Co. and another small line. To summarize, then, of the probable canal steamers, totaling 470,000 tons, 303,000 tons are independent and 167,000 trust controlled—two-thirds independent and one-third dominated by a combination. Plainly the statement that 94 per cent of our coastwise shipping is trust controlled has no basis in fact.

There is another point that I wish to bring out in this connection. Section 11 of the Panama Canal act of 1912 excludes from use of the canal all vessels in which railroads have any interest, and also the vessels of any company doing business in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. This will no doubt make the figures much more favorable than those given above, for surely many of the trust-controlled vessels in our coastwise trade are owned or controlled by railroads, which fact would exclude them from the use of the canal. Moreover, if they are not connected in any way with railroads, but engage in a combine or trust in restraint of trade, that, too, would exclude them from the canal. Omitting these railroad vessels and such as belong to objectionable trusts, it will be seen that only a very small per cent of the shipping which can actually use the canal will belong to a trust.

FREE ROADWAY MEANS INDEPENDENT COMMERCE.

As a general proposition it may be asserted that any transportation agency which is open and free to every citizen of the Republic, which is conducted over a free roadway, be it land or water, and which gives equal facilities at the terminals to everyone, can not possibly be a monopoly. How can there be a monopoly of freight carrying on a public road, where the peasant with his pushcart can compete with the farmer in his two-horse wagon, who in turn competes with the great auto truck, each on terms of absolute equality, so far as the right to use the road is concerned? How can there be a combine on our great rivers, improved at the expense of the National Government, owned and controlled by it, where the poorest man in his little canoe floats as free as the millionaire in his gilded yacht? How can there be a monopoly on the great Pacific, on our own American Canal, on the Gulf, and in the broad Atlantic, where everyone has the same right to compete for trade in a small or large way, as his means allow, and to receive fair and equal treatment in the harbors along our coast? It is perfectly clear that on a railroad, where the roadbed is owned by a single corporation, which controls it and can prevent its use by anyone, a monopoly is entirely feasible, for how can there be any competition if only one person or company is allowed to use the line? But the situation is entirely different with our highways and waterways, where I again say that monopolies are practically impossible. If I am wrong, however, and there be the vicious monopoly which haunts the dreams of many Senators, the way to control it is not by exacting tolls, but by strict enforcement, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, of the law prohibiting the use of the canal to railroad or trust-controlled vessels.

FREE ROADWAYS AND WATERWAYS NOT A SUBSIDY.

It is said that the exemption from tolls of our coastwise traffic through the canal would be a subsidy. I deny the charge. But if a subsidy, it is a justifiable and proper one. All subsidies are not bad. Subsidy is defined to be "a grant of money made by government in the aid of the promoters of any enterprise, work, or improvement in which the Government is to participate or which is considered a proper subject for State aid because likely to be of benefit to the public." It is estimated that the National Government, together with the States, counties, and municipalities has expended upward of a thousand million dollars in the construction of railroads through boundless forests, over marshy wastes, across vast expanses of desert, over great mountains, with the result that every portion of the Union is connected, that a marvelous growth has taken place in many sections inhabited by wild beasts and wilder men that could never have been developed without the aid of the iron horse, and the whole Nation has vastly increased in wealth and population in consequence thereof. Most of this aid was given many years ago, when we were young in years, comparatively few in number, when the necessity for public aid was imperative; and it was dictated by constructive statesmanship of the highest order. My own State of Louisiana was so impressed with the wisdom of increasing its railroad facilities in order to develop its waste places and splendid resources that on two separate occasions during the past 16 years constitutional provisions were adopted which exempted from all forms of taxation for a period of 10 years any new railroad or part thereof, constructed within a certain time, and great impetus was given thereby to railroad building. I believe that these expenditures, bonuses, and exemptions for railroads were in the main wise and beneficial. I am convinced that but for this aid and the consequent expansion of railroads our great Republic, now the marvel of the world, would still be in its infancy; and while there were some scandals in connection with railroad grants, bond issues, and so forth, the benefits far exceeded the evils that arose therefrom.

I have shown that there is no controlling monopoly, nor can there be any, in the coastwise trade through the Panama Canal. Can the friends of repeal and its chief beneficiaries—the transcontinental railroads both in the United States and Canada—show that there is no monopoly in the railroad transportation business? I assert without fear of contradiction that the railroads now control this business and regulate it very largely to suit themselves. I assert that whenever a toll of $1.20 per ton is imposed upon coastwise trade passing through the canal that freight charges will be increased by just that amount, not only on the comparatively small volume actually carried through the canal, but also on the vast business of the transcontinental railroads, many times as great as that through the canal. If we appear in our national bookkeeping to have earned $1.20 per ton, or $1,200,000 on the 1,000,000 tons of coastwise traffic, which it is estimated will pass through the canal next year, the American people will pay the coastwise vessels an increased freight rate for this 1,000,000 tons amounting to $1,200,000, and an increased freight rate to the transcontinental railroads fully ten times as much, or $12,000,000. Hence, where does the benefit come to us? We place in one pocket $1,200,000 collected in tolls from our coastwise ships, and we pay out of the other pocket in increased freight charges to the ships and the railroads $13,200,000, being losers thereby to the extent of $12,000,000.

FREE USE OF PANAMA CANAL NOT A SUBSIDY.

Continuing the subject of subsidy, let me suggest that the States and Nation expended last year on good roads $207,000,000; that there is a great good-road movement going on all over the Union which will probably do more to enhance the value of the Nation's property, to make people more satisfied with farm life, and to cheapen the cost of living than anything within recent years. It is a relic of past ages to charge tolls on good roads, though I believe it is still done to a slight extent in some localities, and surely no one considers it a subsidy to permit the free use of good roads.

The Empire State of New York is now expending on its roads $100,000,000 and on its canal system $127,000,000, aggregating $227,000,000—more than one-half the total cost of the Panama Canal. This vast expenditure by a single State is made to benefit transportation not only for its own people but for the Nation, for the improvement of its great Erie Canal will cheapen freight very materially to and from the entire middle section of our country. No charge whatsoever will be made on these magnificent roads and canals. They will be as free as the wind that blows to every citizen. Can it be said that this is a subsidy? Can it be fairly argued that New York should expend $227,000,000 out of its own unaided resources to assist transportation, and yet the great Union can not extend the slight aid of free passage to our coastwise vessels through the Nation's ditch for the same purpose? The thought is unworthy of us.

Since the birth of our Republic we have spent $705,019,693 to improve all the Nation's waterways, with the idea that it was necessary to facilitate the movement of freight by water and to cheapen and regulate railroad rates. Most of these expenditures have been very effective, and the wisdom of our waterway policy is generally acknowledged. We have never charged tolls for the use of our harbors, rivers, and canals, and if any Congressman should propose such a thing he would be ridiculed into the shades of private life. There is no better settled and established policy of the Government than that we must improve every worthy watercourse in the Union the development of which is justified by the needs of commerce, that the expense thereof must be borne by the Nation, and that the waters must be open and free to all. Is this a subsidy? I do not so understand it; but if it be a subsidy, then surely it is a good subsidy.

We have expended over a hundred millions on the harbors and connecting channels of the Great Lakes, especially the Sault Ste. Marie and the Detroit River. These Lakes are international waters bordering foreign lands, just as do the great oceans. The Soo connects these foreign waters just as the Panama does the Atlantic and Pacific. There is a colossal commerce through the Soo. In 1913 it amounted to 57,000,000 net registered tons as compared with 18,000,000 tons through the famous Suez Canal—more than three times as great as the commerce through the Suez. Do we charge any tolls on this international canal at the Soo? Certainly not. And why? Because we have always believed it wise and proper to give the freest use of our improved waters to our commerce and not to put any obstacle or hindrance whatsoever in its way. If we are to charge tolls at Panama, there is the same reason for charging them at the Soo and on our other improved waters—just exactly the same, and it is impossible to differentiate between them. The Ohio and Mississippi have been and are now being improved, at a cost largely more than a hundred millions. Would the people who use these rivers consent to see tolls charged on their commerce? We are just completing the improvement of the Black Warrior, leading to the famous coal fields of Alabama, and providing for the delivery of its coal to Gulf ports, to the Panama Canal, to the world, at prices lower, perhaps, than any other coal in the Republic. Shall we charge tolls on the Black Warrior? Would it not prevent the very purpose of that great improvement? Shall the people of New Orleans, who are at this moment buying their coal from the Black Warrior fields at 75 cents per ton cheaper than ever before because of the canal line leading directly from the heart of the coal fields to the city, be required to pay tolls and be deprived of the benefit of that cheap coal? Perish the thought. And yet, if we must pay tolls through Panama, why not tolls on the Black Warrior, on the Mississippi, on the Ohio, on the Soo? Will New York also in self-defense be compelled to charge tolls on its canal? Let me again repeat that I can not draw the distinction between free roads and free waterways in the interior of the Union and a free waterway through Panama, a part of the Union, for the servants of the Union, and I do not believe anyone else can do so logically.

FOREIGN NATIONS PAY SUBSIDIES ON THEIR SUEZ CANAL COMMERCE.

For years it has been a well-established practice among many of the leading commercial nations to subsidize their ships passing through the Suez Canal. These subsidies were made either directly or indirectly for the purpose of paying the tolls, and sometimes were less, sometimes equal to, and often more than the toll charge. On page 15 of the report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1911 we find some significant and pertinent information. In 1909 Russia appropriated $3,344,750 for the express purpose of paying the tolls of the merchant steamships of the Russian volunteer fleet through the Suez Canal. As the tonnage of that fleet in 1909 was 130,200 net tons, the Government grant was equal to $2.57 per net ton, or more than sufficient to pay not only the canal charges on the ship, but also on every man, woman, or child on board. The fleet of the British, Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Co., the largest using the Suez Canal, paid in tolls in 1910 £357,989, of which England paid by means of subsidies £297,143, or $1,435,200, about $1.15 per ton. Germany subsidized its principal line, the North German Lloyd, to the extent of $1,385,160 for its mail steamers to Asia and Australia passing through the Suez Canal. In 1910 this grant sufficed to pay all the tolls of that company and to leave a handsome margin of profit. Japan paid a subsidy of $1,336,947 to the Nippon Yussen Kaisha Steamship Co., whose steamers used the canal. In 1908 the largest French line using the Suez Canal, the Messageries Maritimes, was paid by the national Government the colossal subsidy of $2,145,232. In one year Austria paid out of her treasury all the tolls on a number of her steamers for 42 voyages through the Suez Canal besides giving them a subsidy of 4,700,000 crowns, or $854,100. Sweden in three years gave its ships using the Suez Canal 1,850,000 crowns, or $495,800, to pay the tolls on her vessels. Without further details it may be said that several other nations have given material subsidies to their vessels using the Suez Canal, and unless the position of these nations be entirely changed, which seems improbable, they will extend similar subsidies to their shipping through the Panama Canal. Already evidences of this fact exist.

In 1909 Spain passed a law authorizing an annual subsidy of $285,000 to a Spanish steamship line from Cadiz to the Canaries, Porto Rico, and Cuba, "thence through the Panama Canal to ports that the Government shall deem necessary." The Daily Consular Report of May 1, 1914, states that a measure has been introduced in the lower house of the Japanese Diet, proposing an annual grant of from $718,307 to $875,447 to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha Co., whose fleet will be the largest Japanese line using the canal. The Daily Consular Report of April 13, 1914, gives the information that a movement has begun in France to have one of the French lines through the Panama Canal subsidized.

It may be safely predicted that the other great maritime nations of the world will do likewise. What a position, then, will the United States be in with its maritime rivals paying the tolls for their vessels through the Panama Canal, or at least a very large percentage of the tolls, and we exacting the same rate from our vessels enjoyed by the foreign ships, and doing nothing to help them bear the burden! We are already in the humiliating position of having 91 per cent of our foreign commerce carried in ships bearing the flags of other nations and only 9 per cent in our own vessels. Shall we legislate in this bill to further reduce this American tonnage in American ships? Shall we discourage the American marine by enacting a law which we know in advance will be used by our rivals to crush us? For my part, not only would I exempt coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, but also all other vessels flying the American flag and carrying foreign commerce, for I believe that we have the power under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to regulate our foreign commerce through the canal in exactly the same manner that we regulate and control our vessels of war.

ECONOMIC ADVANTAGES OF WATER TRANSPORTATION.

I shall endeavor to show that the American people are interested in a direct personal way in the free passage of coastwise commerce through the canal. In order to do this let me give some examples of comparative freights by rail and water on existing traffic.

In this connection I wish to call attention to the map hanging on the wall, and suggest to you that if St. Louis be taken as a center and a 40 per cent rate be adopted, you will find that the red line which marks the area included within the 40-cent rate follows very closely the Mississippi River and the Ohio River. It is a graphic illustration of the effect of waterways, for just as soon as you leave the river the rates go up and go up very materially.

A study of the rates on railroads leading out of St. Louis affords striking evidence of the effect of waterways. Havana, Ill., is 159 miles from St. Louis, and Poplar Bluff, Mo., 169 miles distant, but Havana is on the Illinois River and has a first-class rate of 36.1 cents per 100 pounds, while Poplar Bluff is an inland town and has to pay 52 cents. The distance to Poplar Bluff is only 10 miles greater; the rate is more than 44 per cent higher.

Springfield, Mo., is 239 miles from St. Louis, while the distance to St. Paul is 593 miles. Springfield, Mo., being inland, pays 62 cents, while St. Paul, being on the Mississippi River, pays only 1 cent more—63 cents—for the greater distance. If the rate to Springfield, Mo., were the same per mile as the rate to St. Paul, Springfield would pay only 25 cents per 100 pounds instead of 62 cents. Vice versa, if the rate per mile to St. Paul were the same as to Springfield, Mo., the rate would be $1.54 instead of 63 cents.

Mexico, Mo., is 116 miles from St. Louis; Cincinnati, Ohio, is 339 miles. Cincinnati is on the Ohio River and boats can ply between St. Louis and that city, so the railroad rate on commodities of the first class to Cincinnati is 41 cents, while that to Mexico, Mo., is 43 cents. Cincinnati is almost three times as far away and has a rate of 2 cents per 100 pounds less than the town to which the steamboats can not run.

These rates were compiled by the Interstate Commerce Commission from the railway tariffs on file, and the distances were taken from the official railway guide.

The rate on salt by the carload from Portland, Oreg., to The Dalles on the Columbia River, the head of navigation, a distance of 88 miles, was $1.50 per ton after the locks were open on the river between these two points, while to Umatilla, 100 miles behind, the rate was $10 per ton. A dollar and a half per ton for 88 miles with water competition; $8.70 per ton without competition.

The general manager of the principal foreign steamship line entering Boston recently stated that freight rates caused by the largest steamships being used as a result of the deeper channel are about 50 per cent less than they were some 15 or 20 years ago when very much smaller steamers were engaged in the trade. This saving of one-half of the cost of ocean transportation at a great port like Boston, resulting from the deepening of the channel to a depth of 35 feet at a cost of about $6,000,000, is of vital importance to the entire Nation. It benefits the wheat grower of the Middle West, the cotton planter of the South, and everyone who imports or exports articles of commerce.

ENORMOUS SAVING BY SOO CANAL.

The total freight through the Soo Canal for 1913 was 79,718,344 tons, carried an average haul of 820 miles, at a cost of $44,380,865, the average rate of transportation per ton per mile being 0.68 mill.

According to the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission on statistics of United States railways for the year ending June 30, 1911, the latest year for which complete figures are available, the average rate per ton per mile received by the railways was 7.57 mills, or eleven times the water rate through the Soo. Preliminary statements for the year ending June 30, 1912, indicate that there was no material change in the ton-mile rate. This exceeds the Soo Canal rate by 6.89 mills, and if the freight which was carried through the Soo had been carried an equal distance by rail at the average railway rate for the years 1911 and 1912, it would have cost $455,128,688.70 more than was actually paid for its transportation by water.

It has been objected that this is not a proper comparison for the reason that a larger proportion of the freight handled by water consists of iron ore, coal, lumber, and other raw material than does freight carried by rail. There is some truth in this contention.

The Virginian Railway—and I am glad to see the Senators from Virginia in front of me—starting from a point near Charleston in the coal-mining regions of West Virginia and running thence to Norfolk, was built at an enormous expense with heavy cuts and fills and many tunnels in order to secure low grades and easy curves and consequent economy of operation. Its freight consists very largely of coal. In fact, it is probable that the proportion of low-grade freight on the Virginian Railway is greater than it is at the Soo, and its rate, which was 3.61 mills per ton per mile for the year ending June 30, 1911, is the lowest in the United States. Even if carried at this rate, which is more than five times the Soo rate, the freight of Lake Superior would have cost $191,419,000 more than was paid for its carriage by water.

There is a very large commerce of about 12,000,000 tons on the Ohio, which is now being canalized so as to give it a minimum depth of 9 feet throughout its entire length. When this improvement is completed coal on the Ohio and Mississippi south of Cairo can be conveyed at a cost of 0.4 mills per ton per mile, or 5 per cent of the average railroad rate, or 11 per cent of the lowest railroad rate. All heavy commodities will move at about the same rate. My authority for this statement is Col. William L. Sibert, member of the Panama Canal Commission and one of the most accomplished engineers on earth.

It appears from the foregoing, therefore, that the public derives incalculable benefit from the cheaper commerce carried by our improved waterways. No one can say what this really amounts to every year, but if the saving on the Soo alone in one year—bear in mind, Senators, the Soo carries only a portion of the Great Lakes commerce—is $191,000,000 as compared with the rate on the Virginia Railway, the cheapest in America, and four hundred and fifty-five millions as compared with the average railroad rates, it is fair to say that the annual reduction and saving due to these improved waters is considerably more than the entire seven hundred and five millions expended upon their improvement during our national life.

FREE PANAMA CANAL MEANS DOLLARS TO EVERY CITIZEN.

The same argument applicable to internal waterways generally applies to the Panama Canal. We should receive similar benefits and an enormous saving in our annual freight bill. If traffic on the Great Lakes, on the Columbia, on the Ohio, on the Mississippi, on the Black Warrior, and in great ports like that of Boston can be carried so very cheap compared with rail, there is no reason why they can not be carried at like rates through Panama, and beyond question they will be. The reduction in our national freight bills between the two coasts is bound to be very great whether we exact a toll charge or not, just as it would be very great on the Soo if we had to pay a toll, for instance, of 50 cents per ton on the commerce passing through it. But if the Government had exacted 50 cents per ton freight charge on the traffic through the Soo last year, it would have amounted to nearly $40,000,000, or practically as much again as the total freight charge paid by this commerce, which, as shown above, was $44,380,865. If this charge of 50 cents per ton had been added to the Soo freight, the rate instead of being 0.68 mill per ton mile would have been about 1.31 mills, nearly twice as much, and the American people, while collecting forty millions in tolls, would have paid out that amount in increased freight charges. The same thing would be true at Panama. A large number of vessels, many of them independent and operating on a competitive basis, will engage in our coastwise commerce through the canal, as I have fully explained heretofore. These vessels will be satisfied with reasonable returns on their investments, and in making their rates they will be compelled to add any toll that is exacted. It follows, therefore, that if no tolls be required, the freight will be less by just that amount.

The companies operating coastwise vessels will not be able to add to their profit the amount of the tolls exemption, because each company will need the advantage of every possible cent of lower freight rates to meet the rates of competing vessels. When the canal is opened there will be a tremendous increase of the number of our coastwise vessels, and each ship will be anxious to carry freight to its full capacity. Since there is no shipping trust, as I have demonstrated, the competition between the tramps and the regular lines, between company and company, between ship and ship, will be very keen, for all of them will be anxious to carry more and more freight, and by seizing every opportunity to develop and increase their traffic as much as possible. They will, therefore, offer every inducement to draw freight to them, and the best inducement is a low freight rate. Hence the consumers of the country will receive the benefit.

As a concrete instance, let us take lumber, a commodity which exists in very large quantities on the Pacific coast, and is becoming scarce along the Atlantic seaboard. The evidence of Mr. Ransom, a lumberman of Portland, Oreg., before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, page 505 of the hearings, was that the present railroad rate from the northern Pacific coast to the Atlantic terminals, such as Boston or New York, is 75 cents per hundred pounds, which is approximately $24 per thousand feet on rough lumber, and less on the lighter grades. He states that the water rate through the canal will be 30 cents per hundred pounds, or $9.60 per thousand feet. His testimony is corroborated by Mr. Skinner, of San Francisco, who is also in the lumber business, and who states, on page 808 of the hearings, that his company now "have an offer of tonnage in cargo capacity of $9 a thousand feet from Puget Sound to New York or the east coast of Pennsylvania, if tolls are not assessed. If they are, the tolls are to be added to it." He also states that "at the same time a 30-cent rate was offered to St. Louis and Mississippi River common points, as against a 55-cent rate by rail. The rate to Mississippi River points, however, was made contingent on the establishment of a line with free tolls." There was a difference of opinion as to what amount a thousand feet of average lumber would pay with the tolls at $1.20 per net ton, and Mr. Teal, of Portland, Oreg., who is one of the ablest and purest men in the Nation, testifying before the Interoceanic Canals Committee, page 929 of the hearings, estimates that it would be about 6 cents per hundred pounds, or $1.66 per thousand feet, which, I believe, is correct. This evidence proves that in any event there will be a net saving in freight from the Pacific to the Atlantic of from $12 to $15 per thousand feet, which is certainly a very material item; and if the tolls are collected this saving would be reduced by $1.66 per thousand feet; hence the consumer of lumber is interested in this question to the extent of $1.66 on every thousand feet of lumber he uses. How would this apply to a citizen of Washington desiring to construct a house in which 20,000 feet of lumber would be required? If there be free tolls, he could get his lumber at a reduction of $1.66 on each thousand feet, or $33.20 less than if tolls are charged. This is quite a saving to the citizen, and, though lumber has been used as an illustration, the same would apply to the innumerable articles exchanged in the course of trade between the two sections of our country, and a proper benefit would be derived on every one of them.

LOUISIANA'S VITAL INTEREST.

Mr. President, when the country was stirred with talk about an Isthmian Canal and all political parties indorsed the idea and speakers upon the hustings and in legislative halls made the welkin ring with the glory and pride of the great enterprise, no portion of our land was more enthused in its favor than the Mississippi Valley and the Gulf coast. The canal will benefit greatly every part of the Republic; but if one place more than another is to be aided by it, that place is the city of New Orleans, situated on the Mississippi River with its 16,000 miles of navigable waters, at the gateway to the Gulf. New Orleans will soon be connected by water with all the rivers of Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Florida by intercoastal canals running east and west from it and now in process of construction. New Orleans is not only the greatest waterway center in the Union but has exceptional railroad facilities, and beyond question it is destined to be the great mart of commerce for the interior section of the Republic in its relations with the Pacific coast of South and North America and the Orient. Not only is New Orleans intensely interested in this canal and everything that tends to make it great and useful, but all the cities of the Mississippi's imperial valley have the same interest. Prof. Emory Johnson says that 65 per cent of the westbound Pacific coast traffic originates in this valley. I thought when this measure was introduced, so fraught with friendship for railways and indifference if not active antagonism to the greatest artificial waterway on earth, that southern Senators and Representatives would be the very first to oppose it, would be the strongest advocates of our coastwise trade, and the most determined foes of repeal. It has been a great surprise and sorrow to me to find so many of them, aye, sir, the big majority, giving their voices to the support of a measure which I think is not only unpatriotic but seriously hurtful to the country, especially to the South. Mr. President, I have no alternative proposition to suggest. I believe that the law of 1912 should stand. It is right; it is wise; it is honorable. I feel as deep a sense of obligation to maintain the national honor as I do for my personal honor, but no question of honor or morality is involved. So many good men differ from me, however, that I would be perfectly willing to let this question be settled either by a national board of arbitration or, better, by the Supreme Court of the United States. I can never consent to repeal, for I consider it a relinquishment of one of our sovereign prerogatives at the behest of a foreign power, and that no obligation in law or morals requires me to yield.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the regular order, which is the unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. SHIVELY. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will yield to me to prefer a request, which will take but a moment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That requires unanimous consent, and I object.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Then, I move that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDRESS BY PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. SHIVELY. I have a copy of the address of President Wilson delivered at the unveiling of the statue to the memory of Commodore John Barry, at Washington, D. C., Saturday, May 16, 1914. I ask that the address may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT WILSON AT THE UNVEILING OF THE STATUE TO THE MEMORY OF COMMODORE JOHN BARRY.

Mr. Secretary, ladies, and gentlemen, I esteem it a privilege to be present on this interesting occasion, and I am very much tempted to anticipate some part of what the orators of the day will say about the character of the great man whose memory we celebrate. If I were to attempt an historical address, I might, however, be led too far afield. I am going to take the liberty, therefore, of drawing a few inferences from the significance of this occasion.

I think that we can never be present at a ceremony of this kind, which carries our thought back to the great Revolution, by means of which our Government was set up, without feeling that it is an occasion of reminder, of renewal, of refreshment, when we turn our thoughts again to the great issues which were presented to the little Nation which then asserted its independence to the world; to which it spoke both in eloquent representations of its cause and in the sound of arms, and ask ourselves what it was that these men fought for. No one can turn to the career of Commodore Barry without feeling a touch of the enthusiasm with which he devoted an originating mind to the great cause which he intended to serve, and it behooves us, living in this age when no man can question the power of the Nation, when no man would dare to doubt its right and its determination to act for itself, to ask what it was that filled the hearts of these men when they set the Nation up.

For patriotism, ladies and gentlemen, is in my mind not merely a sentiment. There is a certain effervescence, I suppose, which ought to be permitted to those who allow their hearts to speak in the celebration of the glory and majesty of their country, but the country can have no glory and no majesty unless there be a deep principle and conviction back of the enthusiasm. Patriotism is a principle, not a mere sentiment. No man can be a true patriot who does not feel himself shot through and through with a deep ardor for what his country stands for, what its existence means, what its purpose is declared to be in its history and in its policy. I recall those solemn lines of the poet Tennyson in which he tries to give voice to his conception of what it is that stirs within a nation: "Some sense of duty, something of a faith, some reverence for the laws ourselves have made, some patient force to change them when we will, some civic manhood firm against the crowd;" steadfastness, clearness of purpose, courage, persistency, and that uprightness which comes from the clear thinking of men who wish to serve not themselves, but their fellow men.

What does the United States stand for, then, that our hearts should be stirred by the memory of the men who set her Constitution up? John Barry fought, like every other man in the Revolution, in order that America might be free to make her own life without interruption or disturbance from any other quarter. You can sum the whole thing up in that, that America had a right to her own self-determined life; and what are our corollaries from that? You do not have to go back to stir your thoughts again with the issues of the Revolution. Some of the issues of the Revolution were not the cause of it, but merely the occasion for it. There are just as vital things stirring now that concern the existence of the Nation as were stirring then, and every man who worthily stands in this presence should examine himself and see whether he has the full conception of what it means that America should live her own life. Washington saw it when he wrote his farewell address. It was not merely because of passing and transient circumstances that Washington said that we must keep free from entangling alliances. It was because he saw that no country had yet set its face in the same direction in which America had set her face. We can not form alliances with those who are not going our way; and in our might and majesty and in the confidence and definiteness of our own purpose we need not and we should not form alliances with any nation in the world. Those who are right, those who study their consciences in determining their policies, those who hold their honor higher than their advantage, do not need alliances. You need alliances when you are not strong, and you are weak only when you are not true to yourself. You are weak only when you are in the wrong; you are weak only when you are afraid to do the right; you are weak only when you doubt your cause and the majesty of a nation's might asserted.

There is another corollary. John Barry was an Irishman, but his heart crossed the Atlantic with him. He did not leave it in Ireland. And the test of all of us—for all of us had our origins on the other side of the sea—is whether we will assist in enabling America to live her separate and independent life, retaining our ancient affections, indeed, but determining everything that we do by the interests that exist on this side of the sea. Some Americans need hyphens in their names, because only part of them has come over; but when the whole man has come over, heart and thought and all, the hyphen drops of its own weight out of his name. This man was not an Irish-American; he was an Irishman who became an American. I venture to say if he voted he voted with regard to the questions as they looked on this side of the water and not as they affected the other side; and that is my infallible test of a genuine American, that when he votes or when he acts or when he fights his heart and his thought are centered nowhere but in the emotions and the purposes and the policies of the United States.

This man illustrates for me all the splendid strength which we brought into this country by the magnet of freedom. Men have been drawn to this country by the same thing that has made us love this country—by the opportunity to live their own lives and to think their own thoughts and to let their whole natures expand with the expansion of a free and mighty Nation. We have brought out of the stocks of all the world all the best impulses, and have appropriated them and Americanized them and translated them into the glory and majesty of a great country.

So, ladies and gentlemen, when we go out from this presence we ought to take this idea with us that we, too, are devoted to the purpose of enabling America to live her own life, to be the justest, the most progressive, the most honorable, the most enlightened Nation in the world. Any man that touches our honor is our enemy. Any man who stands in the way of the kind of progress which makes for human freedom can not call himself our friend. Any man who does not feel behind him the whole push and rush and compulsion that filled men's hearts in the time of the Revolution is no American. No man who thinks first of himself and afte.wards of his country can call himself a" American. America must be enriched by us. We must not live upon her; she must live by means of us.

I, for one, come to this shrine to renew the impulses of American democracy. I would be ashamed of myself if I went away from this place without realizing again that every bit of self-seeking must be purged from our individual consciences, and that we must be great, if we would be great at all, in the light and illumination of the example of men who gave everything that they were and everything that they had to the glory and honor of America.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 8 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 27, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 26, 1914.

ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY.

John L. Caldwell, of Fort Scott, Kans., to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Persia, vice Charles W. Russell, resigned.

SECRETARY OF EMBASSY.

Post Wheeler, of Washington, lately secretary of the embassy at Rome, to be secretary of the embassy of the United States of America at Tokyo, Japan, vice Arthur Bailly-Blanchard, nominated to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Haiti.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

MEDICAL CORPS OF THE ARMY.

The following-named first lieutenants of the Medical Reserve Corps for appointment as first lieutenants of the Medical Corps of the Army of the United States:

Charles Lewis Gandy, from May 6, 1914, vice First Lieut. Robert H. Gantt, who died June 10, 1911.

Alexander Watson Williams, from May 7, 1914, vice Capt. Reuben B. Miller, promoted June 22, 1911.

Louis Hopewell Bauer, from May 8, 1914, vice Capt. Charles A. Ragan, promoted July 14, 1911.

William Washington Vaughan, from May 9, 1914, vice Capt. Henry B. McIntyre, resigned January 10, 1912.

John Berwick Anderson, from May 10, 1914, vice First Lieut. Thomas J. Leary, resigned March 13, 1912.

Eide Frederick Thode, from May 11, 1914, vice Capt. William R. Eastman, promoted April 12, 1912.

Walter Paul Davenport, from May 12, 1914, vice Capt. James F. Hall, promoted April 13, 1912.

Harry Neal Kerns, from May 13, 1914, vice First Lieut. Rozier C. Bayly, honorably discharged May 16, 1912.

Robert Henry Wilds, from May 14, 1914, vice First Lieut. Morris H. Boerner, who declined his commission June 20, 1912.

Austin James Canning, from May 15, 1914, vice Capt. Raymond F. Metcalfe, promoted August 6, 1912.

Lanphear Wesley Webb, jr., from May 16, 1914, vice Capt. Edwin W. Rich, promoted August 7, 1912.

John Henry Hedley Scudder, from May 17, 1914, vice Capt. Robert L. Richards, resigned September 20, 1912.

Wilson Carlisle von Kessler, from May 18, 1914, vice First Lieut. Robert W. Holmes, resigned October 6, 1912.

John Murdoch Pratt, from May 19, 1914, vice Capt. Perry L. Boyer, promoted December 7, 1912.

Coleridge Livingstone Beaven, from May 20, 1914, vice First Lieut. Owen C. Fisk, retired from active service February 1, 1913.

William Guy Guthrie, from May 21, 1914, vice First Lieut. Harry B. Etter, resigned March 29, 1913.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

COAST ARTILLERY CORPS.

First Lieut. Albert H. Barkley, Coast Artillery Corps, to be captain from May 21, 1914, vice Capt. Richard P. Winslow, who died May 20, 1914.

Second Lieut. Joseph F. Cottrell, Coast Artillery Corps, to be first lieutenant from May 21, 1914, vice First Lieut. Albert H. Barkley, promoted.

PROMOTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS IN THE NAVY.

The following-named assistant surgeons in the Navy to be passed assistant surgeons in the Navy:

James G. Omelvena,

Jasper V. Howard, and

Lester L. Pratt.

Asst. Surg. Clarence C. Kress to be a passed assistant surgeon in the Navy, from the 5th day of October, 1913.

Eueidas K. Scott, a citizen of Oregon, to be an assistant surgeon in the Medical Reserve Corps of the Navy, from the 15th day of May, 1914.

Richard C. Reed, a citizen of South Carolina, to be an assistant paymaster in the Navy, from the 15th day of January, 1914.

Asst. Naval Constructor Paul H. Fretz to be a naval constructor in the Navy, from the 30th day of April, 1914.

John J. Brady, a citizen of New York, to be a chaplain in the Navy, from the 12th day of May, 1914.

POSTMASTERS.

MASSACHUSETTS.

John O'Hearne to be postmaster at Taunton, Mass., in place of William E. Dunbar. Incumbent's commission expired March 31, 1914.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Benjamin F. Roberts to be postmaster at Meredith, N. H., in place of James F. Estes, resigned.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Cornelius P. Reing to be postmaster at Mahanoy City, Pa., in place of David M. Graham, resigned.

VIRGINIA.

C. H. Willoughby to be postmaster at Jonesville, Va., in place of Joseph E. Graham, resigned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 26, 1914.

APPOINTMENT IN THE ARMY.

INFANTRY.

Joseph L. Donovan to be captain.

POSTMASTERS.

KANSAS.

Edgar G. Forrester, Wamego.

Louis A. Hamner, Belpre.

MICHIGAN.

Edgar W. Farley, Yale.

Patrick Kearns, Vulcan.

NORTH CAROLINA.

James A. Harrington, Ayden.
John R. Rankin, Gastonia.
Watson Winslow, Hertford.

PENNSYLVANIA.

James A. Cooper, Brockwayville.
Bernard J. Rountree, Haverford.
Lewis A. Snyder, Fullerton.

TEXAS.

George D. Armistead, San Antonio.

WISCONSIN.

Charles Donohue, New Richmond.
Charles Howard, Frederic.
James W. Moore, Watertown.
Noel Nash, Two Rivers.
John E. O'Keefe, Portage.
Alexander Richardson, Evansville.
Owen Sullivan, Hurley.

WITHDRAWAL.

Executive nomination withdrawn May 26, 1914.

W. A. Waddell to be postmaster at Cottonwood Falls, in the State of Kansas.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 26, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, that under the dispensation of Thy providence the conditions prevailing among all classes of our people are better than ever before; that our system of education reaches a larger number and is better calculated to fit men for greater usefulness than ever before; that society is more solidified and has taken a higher moral standard than ever before; that the Bible has a stronger, deeper place in the hearts of men than ever before; that religion is saner and more diversified than ever before; that fatherhood and brotherhood are more potent because the Christ spirit is come into more hearts than ever before.

Continue Thy holy influence until all shall come into Thy nearer presence; for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SIXTH INTERNATIONAL COMMERCIAL CONGRESS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 264, authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the Sixth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept an invitation extended by the Government of the French Republic to the Government of the United States to participate by delegates in the Sixth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, to be held at Paris from the 8th to the 10th of June, 1914; and the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of participation by the United States.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "fourteen," strike out the semicolon and the words "and the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of participation by the United States," and insert a colon and the words "Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted for expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with the said conference."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? It seems to the Chair that if this resolution is going to be passed at all it should be passed now, as the time is short.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. GORE, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is H. R. 15657. The House will resolve itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Tennessee [BYRNS] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, and other bills embraced in the special order of the House.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, while I do not consider that this bill is framed to meet the trust problems at the proper angle, nor do I consider that the bill is provided with teeth to attack this enemy with the results designed to be accomplished by the Progressive bills, still, with what I consider certain necessary amendments, I am inclined to support this bill, because I believe it does take a step in the direction of accomplishing something toward settling our trust problems.

My Progressive colleagues who have spoken in this debate have ably pointed out the difference between the present Democratic program and the Progressive program, and I shall not dwell on that point. There are certain amendments that I think ought to be made to this bill. Some, I believe, will be made, and we shall probably hear them discussed at great length under the five-minute rule.

But the thing that impresses me particularly in this bill, and the thing that I find constantly coming up in every matter that vitally concerns us in our governmental problems, is the thing that overshadows everything else. That is the evidence found here of the immediate struggle that is going on between these great combinations of organized capital and the people. In this bill, try to conceal it as we may, we all know in our hearts that there is one important, great outstanding feature. That is the question as to whether this law shall be directed against the combinations of capital that it was designed to be directed against, or whether it shall be shifted, partially at least, and turned against the very people whom it was designed to protect. [Applause.]

A great deal of discussion has been going on pro and con for 24 years in regard to what class of people this antitrust legislation was directed against. The proposition is so simple that it seems absolutely ridiculous to think that there should be any doubt about it. The men who framed the first legislation of this kind that was put upon the statute books, the Sherman law, had no doubt as to whom this legislation was directed against, and they also, as shown by the debates at that time, were farsighted enough to realize that these great combinations against whom this legislation was directed would be shrewd enough, as they always are, immediately to turn the legislative guns that were trained upon them against the very people themselves.

Senator Sherman, the nominal author of the so-called Sherman law, at least had no doubt as to this question, and in the debate in the Senate, on March 24, 1890, Senator Sherman said:

Now, let us look at it. The bill as reported contains three or four simple propositions which relate only to contracts, combinations, agreements made with a view and designed to carry out a certain purpose which the laws of all the States and of every civilized community declare to be unlawful. It does not interfere in the slightest degree with voluntary associations made to affect public opinion to advance the interests of a particular trade or occupation. It does not interfere with the Farmers' Alliance at all, because that is an association of farmers to advance their interests and to improve the growth and manner of production of their crops and to secure intelligent growth and to introduce new methods. No organizations in this country can be more beneficial in their character than farmers' alliances and farmers' associations. They are not business combinations. They do not deal with contracts, agreements, and so forth. They have no connection with them. And so the combinations of workingmen to promote their interests, promote their welfare, and increase their pay, if you please, to get their fair share in the division of production, are not affected in the slightest degree, nor can they be included in the words or intent of the bill as now reported.

Notwithstanding the disclaimer on the part of Senator Sherman and many others in the Senate at that time as to the class of people designed to be reached by that legislation, Senator George introduced an amendment at that time providing:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between the laborers, made with a view of lessening the number of hours of labor or the increasing of their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture, made with a view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products.

Although Senator Sherman and many others at that time emphatically stated that the language of the bill was plain without such an amendment, the amendment was finally incorporated in the bill as it passed the Committee of the Whole in the Senate. The bill was thereupon sent to the Judiciary Committee, and when it returned from the Judiciary Committee it was passed without this amendment, which had been stricken out in the committee as unnecessary.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The original Sherman bill was considered and reported by the Finance Committee, but the last report upon the bill was from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. And upon that report Senator Hoar was heard, and he declared that the committee had considered that proposition and found it absolutely unnecessary to make any such amendment to the bill.

Mr. MACDONALD. I was about to say that and to quote what Senator Hoar said.

Mr. BARTLETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not mean to anticipate him.

Mr. MACDONALD. The bill introduced by Senator Sherman was considered in the Finance Committee. I have taken up the history of the matter after that report was made.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The gentleman says that the amendment was stricken out in the committee; he means that it was not adopted by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MACDONALD. The amendment of Senator George, adopted in Committee of the Whole, was stricken out by the Judiciary Committee or was not adopted.

Mr. SHERWOOD. That is right.

Mr. MACDONALD. Senator Hoar, when the bill was being debated in the Senate, expressed the general attitude of the students of the question at that time in the following words, which leave no question possible as to the fact. Speaking in the Senate on March 27, 1890, Senator Hoar said:

When you are speaking of providing to regulate the transactions of men who are making corners in wheat, or in iron, or in woolen or in cotton goods, speculating in them or lawfully dealing in them without speculation, you are aiming at a mere commercial transaction, the beginning and end of which is the making of money for the parties, and nothing else. That is the only relation that transaction has to the State. It is the creation or diffusion or change of ownership of the wealth of the community. But when a laborer is trying to raise his wages or is endeavoring to shorten the hours of his labor, he is dealing with something that touches closely, more closely than anything else, the Government and the character of the State itself.

The maintenance of a certain standard of profit in dealing in large transactions in wheat or cotton or wool is a question whether a particular merchant or a particular class of merchants shall make money or not; but the question whether the standard of the laborer's wages shall be maintained or advanced, or whether the leisure for instruction, for improvement shall be shortened or lengthened is a question which touches the very existence and character of government of the State itself. The laborer who is engaged lawfully and usefully and accomplishing his purpose in whole or in part in endeavoring to raise the standard of wages is engaged in an occupation the success of which makes republican government itself possible, and without which the Republic can not, in substance, however it may nominally do in form, continue to exist.

I hold, therefore, that as legislators we may constitutionally, properly, and wisely allow laborers to make associations, combinations, contracts, agreements for the sake of maintaining and advancing their wages, in regard to which, as a rule, their contracts are to be made with large corporations who are themselves but an association or combination or aggregation of capital on the other side. When we are permitting and even encouraging that, we are permitting and encouraging what is not only lawful, wise, and profitable, but absolutely essential to the existence of the Commonwealth itself.

When, on the other hand, we are dealing with one of the other classes, the combinations aimed at chiefly by this bill, we are dealing with a transaction the only purpose of which is to extort from the community, monopolize, segregate, and apply to individual use, for the purposes of individual greed, wealth which ought properly and lawfully and for the public interest to be generally diffused over the whole community.

These words are not the words of anyone especially interested in organized labor. They are not the words of anyone who, as I heard it characterized on this floor the other day by a Democratic Member in addressing especially the Democratic side of the House, was "carried away by socialistic doctrine." These are the words of the late Senator Hoar, a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, to whom I believe no one will deny the virtue of conservatism.

Mr. WEAVER. What Senator did the gentleman say?

Mr. MACDONALD. Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I make a suggestion to the gentleman?

Mr. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. That the members of the Judiciary Committee which made the report did not deny the statement of Senator Hoar. The members of that committee were such distinguished men as Senator Edmunds, Senator Vest, Senator George, and various other men who at that time were not only great Senators but great lawyers.

Mr. MACDONALD. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. I have here a collection of short extracts from the speeches that were made by various Senators at that time, including some of those that the gentleman from Georgia has mentioned—Senator Edmunds, Senator Stewart, Senator Teller, Senator Reagan, Senator George, and some others—all without any question agreeing that the bill as it was presented to the Senate for final passage left no doubt as to the fact that it was not intended to include fraternal orders, labor organizations, or farmers' alliances. I will insert these views of Senators in the RECORD.

[Senate, page 2729, March 27, 1890. Mr. Hoar.]

I said the object of this bill was to prevent the speculation in and engrossing of wheat and similar commodities. I did not speak in that connection of corporations. I said, in speaking generally of the lawfulness and propriety of laborers combining in the matter of wages, that the persons with whom they were to contract were very largely the corporations which were themselves nothing but a combination or aggregation of capital for that purpose. I made no such suggestion as that corporations were the persons aimed at by this bill. That was in a different connection.

Again, suppose that the employers, railroad companies, and manufacturing establishments should say that labor should be put down to two bits a day. Suppose that capital should combine against labor, as it is very much inclined to do, and there should be a combination among the laborers which would increase the cost of production and increase the cost of all articles consumed. Suppose there should be a combination among the laborers to protect themselves from grasping monopolies; they would all be criminals for doing it.

I know that nobody here proposes to interfere with the class of men I have mentioned. Nobody here intends that by any of these provisions, either in the original bill or in any amendment, and I have only called attention to it to see if the efforts of those who have undertaken to manage this subject can not in some way confine the bill to dealing with trusts, which we all admit are offensive to good morals.

I want to repeat that I am exceedingly anxious myself to join in anything that shall break up and destroy these unholy combinations, but I want to be careful that in doing that we do not do more damage than we do good. I know how these great trusts, these great corporations, these large moneyed institutions can escape the provisions of a penal statute, and I know how much more likely they are to escape than the men who have less influence and less money. Therefore I suggest that the Senators who have this subject in charge give it special attention, and by a little modification it may be possible to relieve the bill of any doubt on that point.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The Supreme Court in the Danbury Hat case, when they began to consider the question of the congressional history, referred to the history of this bill in the Senate, but said that Congress had not excepted them and therefore they included them in the decision; but the history which the gentleman has read and the action of Congress was referred to by the court in its decision of the Danbury Hat case in 208 United States.

Mr. MACDONALD. There is no question about the legislative history of the matter. The construction that has been placed on the law, that has dragged these organizations into the purview of this matter, are court decisions and not legislation. The courts have legislated in this matter so far as putting into and bringing under the operation of this legislation classes of men that the legislators specifically did not intend to include and did not include in the bill.

In April, 1900, the Littlefield antitrust bill was introduced in Congress. An amendment there was again offered to the bill, exempting these organizations, as follows:

Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to apply to trades-unions, or other labor organizations, organized for the purpose of regulating wages, hours of labor, or other conditions under which labor is performed.

The bill was passed with this amendment by a vote of 274 yeas to 1 nay, 70 not voting.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has the gentleman the vote on the amendment?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes. The amendment was offered by Representative Terry, of Arkansas.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. He was the minority Representative, the ranking Democratic Representative on the Judiciary Committee of the House, and he made the minority report, and recommended that amendment in the minority report, did he not?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes. The amendment was added to the bill by a vote of 260 yeas, 8 nays, and 76 not voting. The bill then went to the Senate and incontinently died there; and it may be remarked in passing that the author of the bill, after this amendment was added to it, seemed to have lost interest in the matter.

On June 2, 1910, Representative HUGHES, of New Jersey, offered the following amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which contained appropriations for the enforcement of the antitrust law:

Provided further, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or betterment of the condition of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof not in itself unlawful.

That amendment was agreed to by a vote of 82 yeas to 52 nays.

On June 9, 1910, the Senate, by a vote of 34 yeas to 16 noes, decided to strike the Hughes amendment from the bill. I ask especial attention of the committee to the history of this legislation, because it is not only vitally important as a matter of history, but it may be vitally important to the Democratic side of the House as a matter concerning the future of the party. On June 21, 1910, the conferees of the House were directed, on motion of Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey—

That the House do further insist on its disagreement, and that the House conferees be instructed to refuse to concur with the Senate.

On this motion the vote was 154 yeas to 105 noes, 12 answering present, and 119 not voting.

On June 23, 1910, Chairman Tawney, of the conference committee, moved to recede and concur, which meant that the House agree with the Senate and strike the Hughes exemption proviso from the bill. Upon this motion the vote was 138 yeas to 130 nays, 16 answering present, and 105 not voting.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that the vote upon this agreement was the main cause of the loss of the House of Representatives to the Republicans in the succeeding Congress. However that may be, there is no question as to the vital consequence to the party brought about by reason of that vote. No one can read the history of this legislation, the proceedings in the courts, and public events surrounding it without being impressed with the forces that are moving in this matter—that are arrayed in this battle that is being fought. The National Association of Manufacturers under various aliases has been for many, many years past directing its activities in legislative matters almost solely to legislation of this kind.

I think it can be safely said that the public sentiment that has been molded in regard to this legislation—much of it absolutely false, much of it specious—can be charged to the influence of this organization under the domination of officers and agents who were not scrupulous as to their methods, as I shall show a little later, and as is amply shown by the recent investigation of lobbying activities in this House. The acts of these powerful organizations and their secret machinations were sordidly corrupt and unbelievably offensive to the dignity of Congress. They have, by years of labor in obtaining publicity upon these matters succeeded in making current a sentiment that has deceived many honest men in regard to legislation of this character. It has been characterized as, and the fact has obtained belief in some quarters that this is, class legislation. It is not class legislation in any sense that is improper, because antitrust legislation itself is class legislation. It is legislation directed against a class of men and corporations of great wealth in this country who have engaged in criminal operations against the welfare of the people and no other.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I notice in the history that the gentleman is giving of the vote on the Hughes amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill and on the vote of the motion by Chairman Tawney to recede from the instructions that the House gave the conferees and agree with the Senate in striking out the amendment, that there was quite a radical change in the vote.

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Is the gentleman in possession of any information that would enlighten the House on the causes that led to that change?

Mr. MACDONALD. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that I am in possession of a most remarkable piece of information on that point, and I will say further, before reading this, that if there is any Member of this House who has had any doubt in his mind about the existence, as a matter of fact, of the so-called "invisible government" in this country he needs only to read the hearings of your select committee on the investigation of lobbying activities to remove all doubt from his mind. Indeed, as a matter of fact, I think the letter that I am about to read, very comprehensive in its scope, practically tells almost the whole story itself, leaving very little to the imagination; but if you will take the trouble to read the hearings and the 4,000 letters that are published in connection therewith you will have no doubt left in your mind, not only as to the existence of that "invisible government" but as to its power, efficiency, and the actual results that it accomplished. Your mind will be changed, perhaps, in regard to some ideas you may have that lobbying activities mean mere petty corruption, individual venality on the part of Members of Congress. Indeed, you will probably find remarkably few cases of that kind, but you will find a great, gigantic system, that is almost inconceivable in the scope of its operations and its power to accomplish the things desired by those who father it. I ask the attention of the House particularly to the language of this letter, a letter that was written the day following the defeat of the Hughes amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill, that being the amendment exempting labor organizations from the enforcement of the antitrust law, so far as the expenditure of the money appropriated in the sundry civil appropriation bill was concerned.

The letter was written by Mr. James A. Emery, then and now the chief lobbyist of the National Association of Manufacturers, operating in this particular case under the name of the National Council for Industrial Defense. The letter was written to Mr. John Kirby, jr., and bears date of June 24, 1910, and is found on page 2118 of Lobby Hearing Before House Committee, volume 3——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Kirby at that time was president of the National Manufacturers' Association?

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Kirby at that time was president of the National Association of Manufacturers.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thought so.

Mr. MACDONALD. The letter is as follows:

JUNE 24, 1910.

Mr. JOHN KIRBY, Jr.,
514 Reibold Building, Dayton, Ohio.

MY DEAR MR. KIRBY: I had the pleasure of wiring you last night the news of victory on the Hughes amendment after the closest and hardest struggle of the session.

Returning here Wednesday morning from our New York meeting, an interview with the Colonel, Mr. Dwight, and Senator Heyburn showed the Senate to be determined, the House exceedingly weak. Mr. Gompers made his headquarters in the office of Representative CARY, of Wisconsin, in the House Office Building, and had something in the neighborhood of 100 aids about him making a persistent office canvass, petitions and memorials being piled in from every union source. I called at the White House, and being unable to see the President because of engagements, took the matter up with his secretary, who showed the greatest interest and declared he believed the President would take personal part in the fight, and this the President did Wednesday night.

In the meantime, after an hour's conference with Mr. Dwight, the whip of the House——

Mr. BARTLETT. That is, he was the Republican whip?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes. [Reading:]

at his office the program was outlined and carried out to the letter. To the colonel was given a list of 14 names, some Democrats, some Republicans, who voted with HUGHES. He accomplished his work so successfully that of the 14 but 1 failed to either absent himself or vote with us yesterday. I communicated with Mr. Bird, requesting certain telegraphic assistance through his office, and this was carried out, with extensions suggested by himself, with splendid success. In the meantime we hammered the South and West, and while we changed but 2 southern votes on the roll call, 28 Democrats who voted with HUGHES on the last roll call remained away and were as good as votes for us. This demonstration of what our southern friends can do is most encouraging. Especial thanks are due to Capt. Chamberlain, of Chattanooga, the Georgia Industrial Association, who influenced the Savannah, Atlanta, and Columbia and New Orleans members, who did likewise with their Representatives.

At Mr. Dwight's request I called Wednesday night on Judge Madison, the insurgent Representative from Kansas, who formerly sat on the bench. It was felt that if he could be induced to speak on the floor on this subject it would exert a great influence over insurgent Republicans. After a long discussion he agreed to speak and was supplied with all the data which this office could give, and made, as you will see from the RECORD, a most effective speech. Indeed, the language of the debate was bolder and nobler than I have ever heard on the floor, both Tawney and Madison declaring they would leave their seats in the House before they would support such a proposal.

I can not emphasize too strongly the confidence with which HUGHES and the labor people approached this vote. We know from newspaper men that they had telegrams and statements prepared for distribution through the press, and that it was felt that if the House retained its position the Senate, after this last vote, would recede from its position. While I have an assurance of two Senators that they would fight this issue to a finish, I have also the best of authority for believing that the Senate conferees would have recommended the abandonment of their position if the House by a large majority had continued to insist upon the amendment.

The motion, as presented to the House, was that the House recede from its amendment and concur in the Senate amendment, striking out the Hughes proposal. On this motion the ayes were 138, noes 130, answered "present" 16, not voting 105. On Tuesday last the vote to insist on the Hughes amendment was 154 to 105. A majority of 49 was thus overcome, and we had 4 votes to spare, which were not used, the Speaker's vote and 3 Members who would have changed from not present to aye if necessary.

The debate on this subject is comparatively brief, but so instructive and educational, especially as the association was sharply criticized by Mr. HUGHES, the whole matter being presented as our fight, that I have ordered several thousand copies of the debate, as taken from the RECORD, for distribution. The number can be increased in accordance with any suggestion you may make. We can procure franks and distribute the matter as part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD free.

Adjournment is now expected Saturday, although a filibuster is under way in the Senate which may delay matters unexpectedly.

It might be well to consider this paragraph of the letter, in view of the urgent talk of immediate adjournment of this Congress:

Sore fears are also expressed that the President may be inclined to revive his injunction program if Congress is further delayed in adjournment, as he occupies a peculiarly powerful strategic position, the so-called "pork" bills being in his hands for signature, and, of course, no other subject is so dear to the Congressman as public buildings in his district, and he will do anything to get them. The best information at present is, however, that there is no danger in this matter unless Congress should be unduly and unexpectedly delayed in adjournment.

Very truly, yours,

JAMES A. EM.

(Copies to Messrs. Jarvis, Hanch, Schwedtman, and Bird.)

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of this exposure to the open gaze of the forces which have always been directing their attention to opposition to legislation such as contemplated in this amendment, it might be well at this particular time, when we are about in a short time to have another vote upon exactly this same proposition, to look about us, to scrutinize our surroundings, and see if the same forces are at work now. We have made an investigation of the lobby activities, that is true, and we will soon be able to celebrate the anniversary of the cause that led to the investigation; but do you doubt that the forces who are exposed by this investigation are still here and still at work? Do you doubt that some other individual is occupying the same position and writing the same kind of letters that Mr. Mulhall and the other active agents of these forces wrote at that time? You probably will hear speeches upon the floor of this House characterizing the exemption of these organizations as class legislation and vicious, and probably Mr. Emery or some other gentleman connected with the same forces will write a letter characterizing that speech as one of the "boldest and noblest" efforts he has heard upon the floor. Some men may even say that they would rather leave their seats upon the floor than take a part in such a proposal; but if the history of the past is any criterion, some of the gentlemen may have an opportunity to leave their seats, as did some gentlemen in the past who took that position.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask leave to extend my remarks by inserting some correspondence which I will not take the time to read to the committee; but I wish to call the attention of the committee to this first letter as an example of the methods of this organizaion in the molding of public opinion, which is one of the most important activities that this class of men have at their command. I will read just the brief preliminary statement, signed by Mr. James W. Van Cleave, who was president of the National Association of Manufacturers, just as an example of how publicity is used to influence public opinion in these matters. This is from the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, volume 4, page 3777, and is marked "Emery Exhibit No. 10."

EMERY EXHIBIT NO. 10.

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR INDUSTRIAL DEFENSE.

An object lesson.

A most interesting illustration of the power of public opinion is furnished in the following items of a recent incident.

The large majority of our newspapers will be just and fair, providing they are well informed. It is our duty to keep them and through them the public at large informed regarding our work. What in this case was accomplished through the Citizens' Industrial Association of St. Louis can be accomplished in every case and in every place—providing of course that we are right and go about it properly.

Our success in every case, local or national, in which we have concentrated our power properly should be accepted by our membership in a spirit of solemn thanksgiving instead of exultation, and with a conviction that our efforts will continually bring employer and employee closer together, to the benefit of both and of the American public and country. Copy of Republic mailed to you for your full information.

Please read the following carefully and let me hear from you.

JAMES W. VAN CLEAVE,
Chairman.

[Extract from editorial of the St. Louis Republic, the leading Democratic morning paper of St. Louis.]

DECEMBER 24.

The suit (Bucks Stove & Range Co. against the American Federation of Labor) was brought really at the instance of the Citizens' Industrial Association, which in respect of the employing forces represents even a greater degree of extremism and intolerance than does the leadership of organized labor.

[Mr. Van Cleave to the editor of the Republic.]

DECEMBER 25.

Mr. CHARLES W. KNAPP,
President and Editor St. Louis Republic, City.

MY DEAR SIR: I was very much surprised to read the following statement upon the editorial page of this morning's Republic. In discussing the sentence of labor leaders for contempt of court you say:

"The suit was brought really at the instance of the Citizens' Industrial Association, which in respect of the employing forces represents even a greater degree of extremism and intolerance than does the leadership of organized labor."

There is no foundation whatsoever for the statement that the suit in question was brought at the instance of the Citizens' Industrial Association. It was brought by the Bucks Stove & Range Co. in an endeavor to secure justice.

To say that the Citizens' Industrial Association represents intolerance and extremism is an attack upon every one of our 8,000 St. Louis members, which I, as president, can not let go unchallenged. Our organization consists of thousands of professional men, among them many ministers and lawyers, in addition to thousands of employers and employees. We have courted at all times and we are now courting the closest scrutiny of our work and of our principles. In justice to every member of this association I request that you give me the facts upon which you base your editorial expression. We invite the closest investigation, and after an impartial committee of one or two or three men has made such an investigation, if they can point out the slightest justice for calling us "intolerant" and "extremists," I shall resign as president of the association after advocating its disbandment.

It is your duty, as I see it, to either make good your charge or to retract it. For your information I send you herewith a handbook of the Citizens' Industrial Association, and I quote from among hundreds of indorsements contained therein the following few:

The Most Rev. John J. Glennon, archbishop of St. Louis, states in a letter:

"I would like to say that there are many sound features in your organization and that the many irritations produced in the industrial world by the labor unions tend to induce many people to accept all your principles with all that they imply."

The Right Rev. Daniel L. Tuttle, presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church in America, writes us:

"* * * These duties also press so that I am precluded from ranging myself in membership with you as I would like to do, and so am shut up to the course of simply assuring you of my hearty sympathy with you in your earnest effort to stand by 'liberty, public and private,' and to try reasonable ways to explain classes to each other and remove friction between them."

The Rev. Brother Constantine, vice president Christian Brothers' College, writes:

"Needless to say that I enjoyed your course of lectures. You have adopted an excellent method of instructing the people on some of the vital questions of the day. No thinking man can underrate the value of such teachings, as well as the beneficial results obtained. * * * Hoping that you will continue your excellent propaganda of good sound principles and correct views of our great social questions."

The Rev. Henry Stiles Bradley, pastor St. John's Methodist Episcopal Church:

"Allow me to wish for the Citizens' Industrial Association the largest success in its efforts to secure the observance of law and order and bring about industrial peace and good fellowship."

Rabbi Samuel Sale says:

"I take it that this association represents the party of the third part, and it is to be hoped that its activity all over our land may grow so strong as to put an effective stop to this internecine warfare, this enemy of organized, civilized society."

The Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, of Brooklyn, said:

"You are acting here not only for St. Louis, but for the country at large; and not only for the country at large, but for the world beyond. There is not a statesman or a thinker in Europe or in the Farther East who does not watch your progress with the keenest anxiety."

I might go on quoting indefinitely from the statements of men whose unbiased judgment can not be questioned, but the letter has already grown longer than I wanted it to be. I shall send copy of this communication to every member of our association, and I respectfully request that you print it in full.

Truly, yours,

JAMES W. VAN CLEAVE,
President.

CITIZENS' INDUSTRIAL ASSOCIATION MEMBERS EXPLAIN PRINCIPLES—MEN AND FIRMS IN ORGANIZATION DENY THAT THEIR ANTAGONISM TO CLOSED SHOP AND OTHER RESTRICTIVE POLICIES OF ORGANIZED LABOR ARE EXTREME OR INTOLERABLE—SYMPOSIUM OF LETTERS TAKES EXCEPTION TO EDITORIAL COMMENT IN THE REPUBLIC—MEMBERS OF BODY ACCEDE TO REQUEST OF PRESIDENT VAN CLEAVE AND DISAVOW ASSUMPTION THAT ASSOCIATION INSTIGATED SUIT AGAINST UNION LEADERS—EXPOSITION OF PURPOSES.

Below will be found a number of letters addressed to the Republic by members of the Citizens' Industrial Association of St. Louis, at the request of Mr. J. W. Van Cleave, president of the association. A letter of similar tenor from Mr. Van Cleave himself was printed in the Republic of the day following the day on which the editorial appeared, to which these letters refer, but these additional letters contain such a full and complete exposition of the aims and purposes of the Citizens' Industrial Association, as they are understood by those who constitute the organization, that they will be found both interesting and timely. The declarations so positively made that the association was not in any way back of the proceedings against Gompers, Mitchell, and Morrison, instituted by the Buck's Stove & Range Co., must be accepted as statements of fact within the knowledge of the writers. The Republic cheerfully accepts, also, the earnest denials that the Citizens' Association in its antagonism of the closed shop and other restrictive policies of organized labor intends either extremism or intolerance.

Other letters than those printed to-day have been received by the Republic from members of the Citizens' Association, but, being marked personal, or request made that they be not published, they are withheld.

[Editorial.]

THE CITIZENS' INDUSTRIAL ASSOCIATION.

The Republic is indebted to members of the Citizens' Industrial Association of St. Louis for a most interesting symposium which is given place in its news columns to-day. Its readers will doubtless recognize a similar obligation for the full explanation they are given of the aims and purposes the members of this organization have in mind.

These letters, sent to the Republic at the request of Mr. J. W. Van Cleave, president of the association, quite positively correct the erroneous assumption of the Republic that the suit against Gompers, Mitchell, and Morrison was brought at the instance of the Citizens' Industrial Association. The Republic cheerfully gives publicity to this correction and welcomes the opportunity to present the complete exposition of the principles and objects of the organization which these letters embody.

What the association aspires to accomplish is more effectively set forth in these very interesting communications than it possibly can be in any formal platform, and the reader will find them an emphatic disavowal of any wish to encourage extremism or intolerance.

JANUARY 4, 1909.

Mr. CHARLES W. KNAPP,
Editor St. Louis Republic, City.

MY DEAR SIR: I desire to thank you for the effort made in your issue of Saturday, January 2, to correct some of the erroneous statements of your editorials with reference to the Gompers, Mitchell, and Morrison contempt proceedings, as well as to the Citizens' Industrial Association.

Your remarks regarding trial by jury for contempt are very illuminating in face of the statutes under the Constitution. You further say that—

"To bring Mitchell 'within the pale of the law,' for instance, the court quoted from Mitchell's book, 'Organized Labor,' to show that in it Mitchell counseled opposition to injunctions when they opposed anything lawful. The court also referred to the fact that Mitchell was the presiding officer at the miners' convention in January, 1906, when a resolution which made him in contempt of court was adopted. As that convention was held nearly a year before the injunction was applied for, and the book was written several years before, the pertinence of the allusions is not apparent, and only the utmost complacency would accept this part of the reasoning as sound."

It would seem that the reference to these matters was made only for the purpose of concealing and misstating them. Mitchell's views in his book were properly quoted as stated in 1903 and again in 1906, at a meeting of the Civic Federation in New York, to show his attitude and mind to all court orders.

The convention that you refer to was held in January, 1908, and the resolution which placed Mitchell in contempt of court was passed five weeks after the preliminary injunction had been granted, December 18, 1907.

However, as stated in the beginning, I feel well satisfied that you have made an honest effort to set the Citizens' Industrial Association right before the people of our city, and to correct the error contained in your editorial. The points referred to herein are not written for the purpose of continuing this discussion, but merely to call your personal attention to further errors in your editorial expression.

Very truly, yours,

J. W. VAN CLEAVE,
President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman to yield me three minutes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield three minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. MACDONALD. Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, there is really existing no doubt as to the propriety of in express terms exempting associations of this character—fraternal orders, organizations of labor, and farmers' organizations—from the provisions of this legislation directed against the trusts, and that being so I have no doubt in some form or other such an amendment will be made, and that being so there ought to be no evasion possible after the adoption of that amendment.

The amendment ought to be couched in such terms as to leave absolutely no doubt as to the meaning. There ought not to be evasive or technical terms used that would enable the party seeking delay in these matters to plausibly urge the submitting it to the courts for construction. It ought to be plain and simple. Every one of these amendments I have read, offered in the history of this legislation, has been plain and simple. It has said in so many words that this legislation shall not apply to these organizations, and you can not make it any plainer or more complete than by saying these words. Human labor is not a commodity, and the right to organize in such bodies is inseparable from the right of the individual as a member of society, as a citizen. If you mean to exempt these associations from this bill, exempt them and say in so many words that this legislation is not intended to apply to these organizations. Do not attempt to leave any loophole for the claim that while the existence of these organizations is not prohibited yet the courts may still hold the exercise of their vital functions unlawful. No subterfuge, no evasion, is going to satisfactorily accomplish anything. If you intend to exempt these associations, exempt them, and the place to do it and the time to do it is here and now. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am authorized to yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the Baltimore platform has in it this paragraph:

Experience has proved the necessity of a modification of the law relating to injunction, and we reiterate the pledges of our platforms of 1896 and 1904 in favor of a measure which passed the United States Senate in 1896, relating to contempt in Federal courts, and providing for trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt.

Questions of judicial practice have arisen, especially in connection with industrial disputes. We believe that the parties in all judicial proceedings should be treated with rigid impartiality, and that injunctions should not be issued in any case in which an injunction would not issue if no industrial disputes were involved.

The expanding organization of industry makes it essential that there should be no abridgment of the right of the wage earners and producers to organize for the protection of wages and the improvement of labor conditions, to the end that such labor organizations and their members should not be regarded as illegal combinations in restraint of trade.

In the time at my disposal I shall not attempt to discuss the bill as a whole, but shall confine myself to those portions of it which deal with questions of labor organizations and other organizations not having capital stock and not organized for profit, and more particularly with reference to the use of injunctions in such cases and to the question of indirect contempts growing out of them, and referred to in the portion of the platform I have quoted. Much of the trouble between capital and labor from which society has been and is suffering has resulted from the tremendous strides made during the last three-quarters of a century in the invention and perfection of labor-saving machinery. As a result, the relations which formerly existed between employer and employee have been completely changed. The personal relations which existed in the olden time exist no longer.

In the past the employer frequently worked side by side with the employee, and even though he did not do that, he still maintained personal relations with those who worked for him. He knew them individually. He knew their conditions, probably knew their families and more or less of their necessities. If there was sickness in their family he knew of it, and doubtless felt and manifested more or less sympathy and kindness toward them.

The invention of labor-saving machinery has changed all this. The purchase of necessary machines for any given industrial concern, the placing of them, the housing of them, and equipping them for service required an amount of capital greater than one man possessed, or, at least, greater than one man, if he possessed it, cared to risk in a single enterprise. Thus a number of men were required, acting together, to equip and run such an enterprise. In order to avoid personal responsibility for the debts of the concern, corporations were organized, stock was issued to represent the value of the property. Often the stock was "watered" by issues far beyond the value of the property it represented, and sold to persons who never saw the concern, but who were led to believe they would get dividends on their investment.

In this way the modern corporation was substituted for the individual as the employer of labor. The owners of the property ceased to have personal relations with those employed. Agents were selected to superintend and manage the business. Those who did the work and those for whom it was done were utter strangers to each other. Personal relations practically ceased, and all feeling of human sympathy between them ceased, too. About the only interest the stockholder had in the concern was to get dividends on his stock. It mattered little to him whether those who did the work were well or ill, whether their families were properly provided for or badly provided for. Indeed, he knew nothing about these things. Interest on his investment in the form of dividends was the thing that appealed to him, and if the superintendent or manager did not produce those dividends the stockholder would naturally want some one who could and would do that substituted for him.

Thus it might be said that the invention of labor-saving machinery not only caused but compelled the organization of capital into corporations, and now many of these corporations have drifted together—have been combined into great, giant organizations of capital, thus removing the employers of labor further and further away from those who do the labor. In the fierce struggle for dividends the employer and the employed have drifted so far apart that now a condition of antagonism has too frequently taken the place of those former friendly relations.

I have said that what the stockholder in an industrial enterprise looks for is dividends and in the struggle for dividends experience has demonstrated in the past that one of the easiest and most certain ways to get the dividends was by wage reductions, but a wage reduction in one industrial concern logically, if not necessarily, leads to a wage reduction in competing concerns, so that to keep his place in the market the one who began reducing wages would, after his competitors had done likewise, be compelled to make a further reduction.

In the matter of coal mining in my own State within my recollection I have known these conditions to actually prevail. A mine with poor natural advantages, with poor equipments, with inferior management, would find itself unable to compete in the market with mines far superior to it in all those respects. It could only continue to do business by reducing the price of mining, but when it did that its competitors, using that reduction as a lever, forced a similar reduction upon their employees.

The former was then driven to the necessity of a further reduction, which was followed by further reductions on the part of competitors, and thus the process continued until the price for mining coal in Illinois reached so low a level that those who followed that occupation could barely keep soul and body together. It reached a price as low as 30 cents for each ton which passed over a screen with openings large enough to let one-third or more of the coal pass through, the miners getting paid only for that which escaped across the screen.

There were but three courses left for them to pursue—they could starve, quit the business, or organize. They followed the example of capital, they massed their forces, they organized. Instead of moving and acting as individuals, they moved and acted as phalanxes. They had learned by bitter experience the wisdom of Franklin's advice to the colonists, "We must all hang together, or assuredly we shall hang separately." The necessity for union was absolutely forced upon them. They had no other recourse. They acted sensibly and accepted the situation.

The movement to organize unions, to substitute collective strength for individual strength in dealing with their employers at first met serious opposition, indeed, stiff resistance, not always so violent and disgraceful, however, as it is meeting to-day in Colorado and in Michigan.

In many parts of the country the movement was quite successful, and every candid man now admits that the ameliorated conditions of labor are almost entirely traceable to the effectiveness of those labor unions. But the end is not yet. The men who constitute the unions can not for a moment relax their efforts or break their lines.

I do not say that this is the best possible condition. I am not sure that the relations of employers and employees have taken the most fortunate direction. I think it were possibly better if industrial development had taken a different course; but it did not. It developed and is developing in such fashion that wealth—great wealth—and the power that goes with it are on the one side and great numbers and the strength that goes with numbers when they are united are on the other side. So long as these forces are free and nearly equally balanced it will probably work out all right. The struggle has been a bitter one, and in many sections of the country it is still a bitter one. It is, however, but a repetition of history, and when the struggle ceases in this form it will be renewed and waged along some other line. At least that seems to be the teaching of history.

At one time in the history of our race the war lord reigned supreme over the multitude. They were compelled to follow him and to fight for him and even to die for him. Whether his object was to rob his neighbor baron or to keep his neighbor baron from robbing him was a matter of no consequence to them. In either case it was their duty to submit to their superior's will.

After ages of conflict the many succeeded in depriving the few of this supreme power over their lives. But the scene only shifted; the war lord became transformed into the landlord, and those who formerly had fought for him now merely worked for him. He was the absolute owner of the one thing most necessary to their existence—the land. He permitted them to get a bare living as the result of their toil. The rest was for him. And all this he accomplished through control of the machinery that made, determined, and enforced the law.

For centuries the many struggled for a nearer approach to justice, for a more liberal reward for their toil, and little by little they succeeded. They wrung from their masters the right to own the soil they cultivated, so that now, even in Ireland, where this system existed in its most malignant form, landlordism is rapidly disappearing, and it will soon have entirely disappeared in the Old World. We should be careful that it does not reappear in the new. But the disappearance of the war lord and the landlord is no sort of guaranty that like things may not happen again. Indeed, I might say that once more the scene has only shifted, and that in our modern life the industrial lord is their descendant or successor, and that he is now dominating society and exploiting the multitude as surely as the war lord and the landlord did in their day. Nor will the struggle ever cease so long as man inhabits the earth; in some form or other it will probably go on. The selfish men, endowed with superior ability, will seek and will gain advantage over their fellows, and such advantage can only be met and offset by concerted action on the part of those whom they would exploit.

No wiser or more practical aphorism has been spoken by anyone than was uttered by Wendell Phillips when he said, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." I wish men would take it more to heart. The time will never come when those who love equal liberty, who believe in equal opportunity, can rest on their oars, feeling that the battle is won.

This struggle between organized wealth and organized labor has now reached a stage where more than merely industrial affairs are at issue. The liberties of the American people are now seriously involved in it. Liberty with us is an orderly thing. It does not mean license. Indeed, mere license is the fatal enemy of liberty. As Dr. Brownson said:

> True liberty secures at once the authority of the State and the freedom of the individual; the sovereignty of the people without social despotism and individual freedom without anarchy.

This is the kind of liberty we want—orderly, regulated liberty, never forgetting that in the great charter of liberty—the Declaration of Independence—the order of importance runs, "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," or, more briefly, property.

Life is the primary right; without it we can not enjoy the others. Liberty—that is, the right to be free from unlawful restraint—stands second, and properly so. The right of property occupies only third place. Have we not been transposing this enumeration, and putting property too near the first place?

Under our scheme of government, in the last analysis questions in dispute have to go to the courts for settlement. They are the final arbiters between disputants. Their decisions give trend and direction to our affairs, and the machinery which we have adopted for administering distributive justice has in it an ingredient which is invaluable in a political way as it is in a judicial sense. I refer to the jury system.

The acute struggle between organized wealth and organized labor has found its way to the courts, and there is some reason for believing that the courts, and more especially the Federal courts, consciously or unconsciously, have leaned too much to the side of organized wealth, to the side of property. In no other way is this more apparent than in the use—might I not say the abuse—of the writ of injunction and the use of the court's power to punish for contempt of its orders when the alleged contempts were committed out of its presence. The writ of injunction, which was originally intended and used to preserve and protect property and property rights, has of late been extended beyond its original purpose, and, in my judgment, beyond its legitimate purpose, and has been invading the field of the criminal law as well as of the common law.

The history of the world proves that the possessors of great wealth constantly strive for special privileges, and too often get them. Having obtained them, the possessors naturally object to dividing the advantage thus secured.

A certain gentleman whose wealth is so great that his laudable desire to die poor seems impossible of realization made a great deal of that wealth by exploiting labor. But when labor asked for an additional pittance out of the great tidal wave of dollars which swept into his coffers the request was contemptuously spurned and the Homestead strike which followed has helped to make history.

He was able to avoid the force of the law which should have hampered his action, and the law which favored his side of the controversy was not only availed of but stretched beyond its proper limitations. The same thing is happening to-day.

Hired thugs and assassins who should be in strict confinement, and hired private detectives who are most dangerous and unscrupulous fellows, at the suggestion of organized wealth are designated as officers of the law and necessarily given the discretionary power an officer of the law must have in performing his duty. Federal courts are appealed to for restraining orders to prevent the exercise of fundamental rights, and such orders are granted, at first with some reluctance and caution, but later with almost profuse liberality. Many of these restraining orders, in my judgment, are not within proper limits. They involve the principle that the right to labor is a property right, and can be dealt with in the courts as such, and therefore can be reached by the writ of injunction. In this, as I hope to show, lies an invasion of the rights of every citizen which, if followed and applied, would lead to the gravest and most dangerous form of tyranny. I do not believe this condition could ever have happened in this country, or would have been tolerated for a single moment but for some peculiar circumstances which are often overlooked. I think they are worth recalling at this time.

When these labor troubles first became serious a custom developed among employers of sending agents to those portions of Europe where unskilled labor was most plentiful and most easily obtained, where many of the people would be glad to emigrate if they only had money enough to pay their passage. These agents not only offered to pay their way to America, but to furnish them steady employment when they got here. Glad of the opportunity to get to this modern land of Canaan these people cheerfully entered into labor contracts covering periods of years, and thus bound up they were imported to the United States to take the places of striking workmen.

When their contracts expired, sometimes before, these people had learned that in America men had rights, and in their way they began to exercise those rights, and soon they passed from the stage of strike breakers to that of strikers.

As strike breakers they were kept together as much as possible; they were given little opportunity to associate with others or to learn the ways or the language of the country. They did not become a real part of the population among which they lived. They received no sympathy; they were the objects of contempt and even hatred, and so even when they passed to the stage of strikers there was little sympathetic feeling toward them. People generally remembered only what they had been, and when their employers succeeded in getting the courts to strain the law, to substitute equity law for criminal law in dealing with them, to strain the Constitution to fit what seemed an unconstitutional case, many people, I say, remembering only what these people had been and what they had done to others, thought, "Oh, well, they are only a bunch of foreigners who a little while ago were strike breakers, and it serves them about right." Few cared about an invasion of their rights, and so the precedent was easily established. Once established, it soon grew strong and lusty. Similar conditions are to-day paralyzing the governmental machinery of a great State to such an extent that it voluntarily abdicates its functions and surrenders the temporary exercise of them to the Federal Government. We can now see that it was a grave mistake to permit the sacrifice of the rights of those unfortunate immigrants, and that it would be not only a grave mistake but a crime to ignore the rights of these Colorado strikers of to-day because they are Greeks or Armenians or other foreigners who are alien to our ways and probably can not speak our language. When the rights of any man in America are invaded or sacrificed the rights of every man in America are endangered. Those who supinely look on while their neighbors' rights are being violated can not hope to long preserve their own.

The outrages which resulted from the importation of contract laborers brought about a salutary change in the law and resulted in the absolute prohibition of such immigration. But the change in the immigration laws did not change the practice as to the improper issuance of injunctions or improper punishments for alleged contempts. The camel had succeeded in getting his nose under the tent. Fortunately, perhaps, the evil kept on growing until public attention was riveted upon it and until the necessity for action became apparent to all right-minded, right-thinking people. Under this far-reaching injunctive power the Federal judge was wielding dangerous power; he was the law and the gospel and the prophets as well. He issued his ukase and then punished as for contempt anyone who, according to his view of the evidence, was guilty of violating it. Constitutional guaranties were brushed aside, trial by jury was ignored, and the same man whose order was supposed to be violated and whose dignity was thus invaded became both judge and jury. He heard the evidence; he determined the fact; he fixed the punishment; he spoke the first word and the last word, and from his conclusion there was no right of appeal.

Now, I lay down the proposition that there is no single factor in our system of Government more vital, more important to the people's liberties, than the jury system—than the right of trial by jury.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Very briefly; my time is short.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask one question.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In referring to the abuse of the injunction principle that the gentleman is addressing himself to, does he regard the Debs case, specifically speaking, as a concrete example of the abuse of the system?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There are some things in the Debs case that illustrate the point I am making. The whole case would not illustrate it. But I do not care to discuss that, if the gentleman will pardon me. I can not afford to do it at this time.

Mr. FESS. Does this law correct that feature?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Well, it will not be very difficult, in my judgment, to add to it in such a way as to reach that feature, and I hope the addition will be made.

Mr. FESS. May I read one sentence?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Not in my time.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman decline to yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have but a few minutes left, and I have some matters in my mind that I wish to speak of, and I hope the gentleman will forbear. I have only a few minutes left.

Mr. FESS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The jury system, I said, is the anchor of our liberties. From the earliest time nations that enjoyed a real system of jurisprudence separated the decision of questions of fact from the decision of questions of law.

Many a time in the history of the past have brave liberty-loving jurors stood between the people and judges who were venal or vicious and saved a victim from the vengeance of the Crown.

Under our system the courts are the sheet anchors of our liberties. If confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the law was lost the Republic could not long survive. But nothing tends more to preserve that confidence than the jury system. It is not a very difficult matter to apply the law to a given state of facts, but it is often difficult to ascertain what the real facts are.

Every wise system of jurisprudence recognized that it were better to have one set of men determine what the facts in a case are and another set of men to apply the law to those facts. The ancient Romans, who first gave the world a real system of jurisprudence, realized and adopted such a plan. They usually submitted questions of fact to laymen for decision, and that practice runs like a thread through the history of all English-speaking people. A great English jurist, Lord Camden, said:

> Trial by jury is the foundation of the British constitution; take that away and the whole fabric will soon molder into dust.

And this is even truer with us. The jury is even more necessary in popular governments than in constitutional monarchies.

The part which the jury takes in the administration of justice is a most important one. It brings the administration of justice home to the people themselves, and thus inspires confidence in the administration of the law. The jurors are chosen from the body of the people. Their neighbors know them personally and have confidence in their integrity. If they do happen to decide contrary to the judgment of their neighbors, it is called an error of judgment, and does not diminish public confidence in the honesty and integrity of the courts. Should a judge whom the people did not know render a similar decision it might, and probably would, be attributed to partiality or an even worse motive, and if repeated often would soon destroy that confidence in the administration of justice which is so essential to the stability of our Government. Those thoughtless or selfish persons who cry out against the jury system probably fail to realize how absolutely necessary it is as a political institution to the stability and permanence of the Republic.

True, juries sometimes make mistakes. But that is not quite the question. The real question is to reduce such mistakes to a minimum and to make it clear that they are only mistakes. Human justice is comparative, not absolute; it aspires to perfection with no hope of reaching it, and it is the judgment of many of our wisest and most experienced jurists that fewer mistakes are made in ascertaining the truth about the facts that are in dispute by twelve men from the ordinary walks of life than by one or even by twelve experienced lawyers or judges. As an eminent jurist has said:

> Juries take a common-sense view of every question according to the peculiar circumstances, whereas a judge generalizes and reduces everything to an artificial system formed by study.

Another of even greater experience says that judges are apt to acquire a habit of forcing cases into rigid forms and arbitrary classes.

Justice Miller, late of the United States Supreme Court, said in a public address that—

> Judges are not preeminently fitted over other men of good judgment in business affairs to decide upon mere questions of disputed fact.

Judge Dillon, a law writer of eminence and a jurist of more than national reputation, says:

> Twelve good and lawful men are better judges of disputed facts than twelve learned judges.

Few judges had longer or more varied experience with juries than the late Judge Caldwell, of the eighth Federal judicial circuit. After 35 years of experience, he said:

> It was because the people knew that judges were poor judges of the facts that they committed their decisions to a jury, and every day's experience confirms the wisdom of their action.

And Judge Cooley, whose writings illumine the Constitution and whose judicial decisions shed luster on the Supreme Court of Michigan, tells us that—

> Juries are better calculated to judge of motives, weigh probabilities, and take what may be called a common-sense view of a set of circumstances involving both act and intent than any single man, however pure, wise, and eminent he may be.

In a recent case reported in the One hundred and thirty-fifth Federal Reporter, page 1, the court says:

> The bench once accounted for familiar physical and mental conditions by witchcraft, and that, too, at the expense of the lives of innocent men and women. In that day it was said from the bench that to deny the existence of witchcraft was to deny the Christian religion. Juries would have done better. Then and now questions of fact were best tried by jury.

The right of trial by jury is considered so fundamental, so very important that in my own State and in many other jurisdictions a defendant in a felony case will not be permitted to waive his constitutional right to trial by a jury and submit the evidence to a judge or, indeed, to any number of judges.

In Illinois a man over 60 years of age is disqualified under the law to serve as a juror, although he would have 11 others to assist him, and their joint verdict is subject to review by the judge, and under the Federal practice the same rule must be applied to jurors in the Federal courts in that State.

But a Federal judge who may be more than three score years and ten, sitting to hear a contempt case, hears the evidence alone, determines the facts alone, passes judgment, and inflicts whatever punishment he pleases, although in statutory cases of similar character, where the maximum punishment is not as severe, he could not qualify as even one-twelfth of the jury. And when we consider that the defendant has an absolute right to have the verdict of the jury reviewed in a higher court, whereas no such right of review exists in contempt cases passed upon by less than one-twelfth of a jury, the dangerous character of the proceeding becomes more apparent.

Instances illustrating this danger might be multiplied indefinitely. I will cite only one:

In a case before a certain New Jersey judge, the defendant, a clergyman, testified that he paid to the complainant, an old lady parishioner of his, $1,000 in bills for certain real estate she had deeded to him. She denied the payment. There were some other circumstances in evidence bearing on the issue of fact between them. After considering the evidence, the judge declared that the clergyman was untruthful, and decided the case against him. On the identical testimony the case was taken to the court of errors and appeals. It was there decided by a unanimous court of 12 judges that the clergyman had not sworn falsely and that the testimony of the old lady was glaringly false, and the judgment was reversed.

A little later the same judge wrote an elaborate opinion in a divorce case which he tried, exhaustingly reviewed the evidence, declared the wife guilty of adultery, and granted the husband a divorce on that ground. The case was taken to the court of errors and appeals on the same evidence heard by him, and in a very able opinion written by Judge Vredenburg the judgment of the trial court was reversed and the wife's name saved from dishonor. Fifteen judges decided the case in the higher court, and in their opinion they say "her reputation under the proof is entirely without a stain or a blemish upon it."

The same judge, who was so absurdly wrong in these cases, afterwards tried, convicted, and sentenced some striking workmen for violating one of his own injunctions. Under the law the defendants had no right to appeal and had to abide by his decision. He alone heard the evidence, he alone decided the fact whether or not they were guilty of contempt of his order, and from his decision of the fact, whether right or wrong, the men had no appeal, no recourse. If his ability to weigh evidence and determine facts was no better in their case than in the others mentioned, what a gross outrage was probably perpetrated on these men in the name of the law; what a blow was given to popular confidence in the courts; what a wound was inflicted on the cause of real liberty!

How can a man subjected to such treatment feel that he stands equal before the law with those who obtained the order which was the foundation or the apology for his punishment?

How can he love such laws, and how can he love the country and the Government which tolerates them?

The Federal statutes contain a specific provision that any person who, by threats or force, obstructs or impedes the due administration of justice or endeavors to do so shall be fined not to exceed $500 or imprisoned not to exceed three months, or both. The defendant has a constitutional right to be tried by a jury under this law.

Such conduct, if proved, would only amount to contempt of court. But after a trial by a judge and jury of twelve men, three months is the longest punishment the court could inflict; but for violating an injunction order which forbade one to exercise the constitutional right of free speech or forbade him to walk on the public highway at a certain place, after a hearing before one man who is too old to be a juror, whose dignity is offended by a supposed violation of his order, and who for that reason alone would be subject to challenge as a juror, the accused might be—nay, has been—sent to prison for more than a year, and might in addition be fined thousands of dollars. Is it not monstrous?

Oh, but you say no judge would exercise such tyrannical power.

I answer, judges have closely approached it. And, besides, it is not enough to know that persons having such power have not used it; liberty-loving men want to know that no such power exists.

This bill secures that result. This bill provides for the determination of the facts in cases of indirect contempt by twelve competent jurors. This bill secures to the workingman equality before the law; it simply treats him as others are treated; under its provisions he ceases to become an outlaw because he protests against intolerable conditions by striking. It is a new bill of rights, a new charter of liberty, and marks the beginning of a new era in the emancipation of labor and in the practical application of the principles enunciated in the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. It is my intention to vote for this Clayton antitrust measure in the hope that it will be remolded into proper shape in the Senate.

I am very much disappointed in the bill. It is loosely drawn and its meaning is so involved that useless lawsuits will be the result if it is not substantially changed in later stages. I had expected better results from the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Clayton, the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. FLOYD, and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. CARLIN, the authors, as I am told, of this measure. I know that they are capable of far better work. I know that they intended to draw an effective bill. What we need are proper restraints on great combinations, not shackles on legitimate business. The authors of this bill have by no means presented a measure calculated to give us what we need.

The fact is that we have been in session continuously for 15 months. We have been trying to deal with an endless variety of subjects and our minds have become utterly flat, stale, and unprofitable. I confess that I am in that condition myself. My mental alertness, if I ever had any, has entirely lost its edge. If the first 15 months of Democratic rule has shown us nothing else, it has proved conclusively that it is better to have a short program thoroughly executed rather than to have a long program superficially polished off. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 2 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in the partial discussion of these bills there has come to the surface a peculiar condition at which I must express my surprise. I have the greatest respect for the gentleman [Mr. GARDNER] who has just addressed us; but when he says that he will vote for this measure as it is, hoping that the Senate will whip it into proper shape, it occasions in me much surprise.

The other day, when an amendment was offered to the bill for the creation of a trade commission, one of the gentlemen in charge said:

> It is dangerous to amend a bill when it is on its passage in the House. Your amendment is well conceived and probably should be embodied in this bill, but we will let that be done when it goes over to the Senate.

Has this body lost all deliberative legislative power? Are we bound by the report of a committee so that we dare not touch the language of a bill to change or modify it? Must we simply be a recording machine to place in the RECORD by our votes the expression of the Chief Executive, made through a chosen committee? Must we simply yield everything up to the power of caucus rule, which shall tell us "You must pass this measure as it is; and, having received the imprimatur of the caucus, it is dangerous to meddle with it on the floor of the House, for we do not know where amendments will lead us to or what changes they may effect in the whole legislation"?

I am surprised to think that this House of Representatives is incapacitated from considering fairly and calmly and deliberately any measure and attempting to effectuate any amendment that might be thought proper and wise to incorporate in it.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. With pleasure.

Mr. CARLIN. I just wanted to interrupt the gentleman to advise him that there has been no caucus, so far as this bill is concerned, or on either of the bills now included in the rule.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The distinction may be real, and I do not question the veracity of the gentleman from Virginia when he makes his statement; not for a moment. But my understanding of the situation is that there was a caucus which decided upon a program. I do not mean that it went so far as to determine everything in connection with these bills, but there was a policy adopted, and that policy is being pushed through this House without any change. You could not amend the trade-commission bill, no matter what the reason might be that lay at the root of your amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. And I fear you can not amend this bill for the same reason, although I am led to hope, from the language of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], that perhaps with respect to this bill, fraught as it is with so many things of vital interest to the business community and the citizens of the country, there may be opportunity given to amend some of these provisions; and it is with the hope that that may be done that I take the time and try the patience of the House to speak at all upon the measure, for if I had not that glimmer of hope I would remain silent, having expressed my views, so far as I am able to do so, in the minority report which is now before the Members.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will say to the gentleman that if he is laboring under the idea that there is any caucus action binding the Democratic Members to vote for this particular bill or to vote against all amendments, he is laboring under a mistaken idea; because there are some of us who intend to vote for some amendments that are to be proposed to this bill; that is, if they meet our judgment. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is a confirmation of the hope that is within me, and I am glad to have it confirmed from such a distinguished authority.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to state to the gentleman that I am as loyal to the action of my party as any man in the House, and I do not understand that we are bound by anything except to vote to consider this bill as it is being considered and as it will be considered for amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. For this information I am grateful, and I appreciate the fact that the gentlemen upon the other side are now free to vote for any amendment that may be offered to this measure; and there are many parts of it that require amendment before it shall be passed by this House I hope to see this information fructify and be illustrated by the votes which will speak louder than protestations of freedom when the time comes to express yourselves by your votes.

What is the object of this present legislation? We are told in the report of the committee that it is to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes. If it were limited to those things which have been well considered by the courts and are now understood by the business world, then the measure might commend itself to our judgment and our approval. But there are new standards set up in this measure that are unknown to the antitrust laws of the United States which will require new interpretations at the hands of our courts and will plunge business into a condition of uncertainty and doubt for probably 25 years more.

The majority report contains the following quotation—I presume it is taken from the address of his excellency, the President, to this Congress:

> Additional articles in our constitution of peace, the peace which is honor and freedom and prosperity.

These provisions, expressed in this proposed bill, are thus denominated by the majority of our committee:

> Additional articles in our constitution of peace.

I would that they were, for then they could be voted for without hesitation or objection. I would that the very thought which seemed to dominate the message of the President was really true, that he recognized that big business, as it is called, had seen the handwriting upon the wall, that it had taken note of the power of the Government to control our industries, and that it had bowed its head before the authority of statutes and of courts. This was the message and proclamation of peace in which the President said:

> We now understand each other, and will henceforth go forward, aiding to bring about the finest condition of prosperity of which the country is capable.

Does this measure which is now under consideration illustrate any such purpose?

We are told that this bill is not designed to hinder or destroy business, but to help it. When you examine the provisions of the bill separately and study their application to business, can you honestly reach such a conclusion as that? It were more true to say that this bill is designed to harass and annoy small business, small corporations, and invade the freedom of business to an extent hitherto unparalleled in the history of legislation in this country.

No one questions the importance of this subject. No one can but feel that this is really a measure that ought to have our best and most serious thought. This whole subject of the regulation of monopoly, regulation of interstate trade, or, as the Constitution puts it, regulation of commerce, is now perhaps the most important subject and topic that may engage our attention.

I wish to read the words of a distinguished lawyer and statesman, and one who, while he was on the bench, exemplified that he was a most learned and competent judge. I quote from the recent article of ex-President Taft:

> The Federal antitrust law is one of the most important statutes ever passed in this country. It was a step taken by Congress to meet what the public had found to be a growing and intolerable evil in combinations between many who had capital employed in a branch of trade, industry, or transportation, to obtain control of it, regulate prices, and make unlimited profit. Whether Congress intended it or not—

I commend that portion of his remarks to the consideration of every Member of this House in connection with the question whether or not labor organizations should be exempted from the operation of this statute. There can be no doubt that the language of the statute on its face, by natural interpretation, must be applied as it stands to labor organizations and every other organization which by its combination may restrain trade or tend to create a monopoly.

> Whether Congress intended it or not—> it used language that necessarily forbade the combinations of laborers to restrain and obstruct interstate trade.

He says—

> The statute therefore qualified three important phases of what we include in the general term "individual liberty"—the right of property, freedom to contract, and freedom of labor.
> In this law Congress used general expressions—"restraint of trade," "monopoly," "combinations," and "conspiracy."

And I interrupt the reading to comment that that is the true spirit and thought in legislation. Legislation is unscientific that attempts to deal with the details of every transaction that may come up. The purpose of legislation is to define in general and well-accepted terms something that is obnoxious to be a crime or illegal, and then leave it to the courts under the circumstances in every case to determine whether or not the law fits the facts. That is a question for the court and jury to answer, and the application of the law to the particular abuses that may be complained of, with its general definitions and terms, becomes a matter of ease and facility.

> It was passed in a country that recognized as controlling that customary law handed down to us from England, and known as the common law. It was drafted by great lawyers who may be presumed to have used those expressions with the intention that they should be interpreted in the light of common law, just as it has been frequently decided that the terms used in our Federal Constitution are to be so construed.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. CULLOP. Does not the gentleman think that the reason that statutes are now made specific in regard to certain things such as the gentleman has enumerated there is because the courts in rendering decisions have attempted to legislate instead of construing the law as it has been enacted?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. On the contrary, my personal experience in connection with the administration of the law in our courts leads me to believe that there is no fairer and no safer method of administering the law than to leave the question in each specific case, under proof of the facts, to be determined by the court and the jury. All this talk about legislation on the part of the courts is justified only in a few exceptional instances. I know of nothing that is more unfair and untruthful than that which has become seemingly a shibboleth of the party in a political contest when they cry out that the Supreme Court of the United States wrought into the antitrust law the idea of reasonableness. Any man that understands the law, any man that practices the law, any man that follows the decisions of our courts, knows that the reasonable interpretation of the statutes is a part of the natural treatment that every court must give to it, and it is the only way in which human affairs can be administered with safety. [Applause.] And the writing of that was perfectly just, and it was not legislation; it was a proper interpretation of the statute. What else have we in the world, as Omar Khayyam says in his matchless verses, "but the light of reason" to guide us in our pathway through the mazes of this world? Reasonable interpretation! Why, that is law, logic, justice, and common sense. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, I wish in that connection to read a quotation from my very distinguished and able colleague on the committee, Mr. FLOYD, and I have read his argument in the RECORD with great interest, and do not hesitate to pronounce it as one showing great industry and great ability. I must, however, take exception to this:

The Progressive Republican stands for regulation and curbing of these trusts, and our old friends, the "standpatters," stood pat until all the popularity they ever had slipped away, and until in the last election they carried only two States. Their failure to enact legislation to curb and destroy monopolies and trusts was largely responsible for the division in their ranks which resulted in their defeat.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 30 minutes more.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to remind gentlemen that the first law written upon the statute books of my country, this famous antitrust law, was conceived in the brain of Republican Senators, written on the statute books by the votes of a Republican majority and signed by a Republican President. [Applause on the Republican side.] The first legislation upon this subject came from us. The loss to which my learned brother refers was bred in the Chicago convention, and resulted from a split in the Republican lines which gave to the Democracy an accidental victory by which, though in the minority in the Nation, they possess the majority of votes in this House and have filled the place of the Chief Executive.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not further proof that the legislation in the States, which have brought about a reasonable control at least of the corporations of this country, was originated by Republicans and passed in Republican States before it was ever taken up or approved of by the Democrats in any way?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I thank my colleague for calling attention to that. For if you take the 20 States that have passed antitrust legislation and read the record, you will find that it is largely Republican legislation that has written on the statute books these antitrust laws in reference to interstate-trade violations or the creation of monopolies.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. However that may be in other States, it is not true in the State of Ohio.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Well, Ohio has always been somewhat exceptional in its political history. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; I am going on. I have not time enough now. If I have any time remaining, if the gentlemen will kindly reserve their questions, I will be glad to answer them.

Now, I am going to read a brief extract from the same distinguished statesman's address or lecture, because it is pertinent to what one is impressed with when one reads the debates in this House, and then I propose to refer to some speeches, not by the way of criticism but to make the suggestion as to how inappropriate much of the reasoning is and how inapplicable it is to the situation before us:

One difficulty in giving the public a clear understanding of the meaning and effect of the statute has been that it has been made a football of party politics, that shibboleths have been fabricated out of it without any clear understanding of the distinctions which the court has made, that results have been misrepresented and the superlatives of stump oratory have been substituted for a clear statement of the scope and operation of the law. Politicians have seized upon phrases that would attract the public eye, the meaning of which in the law they have not themselves understood, and have proposed amendments to accomplish purposes of a most indefinite character without knowing or caring how they were to operate, if only the pressing of the amendment gave them a ground for appeal for votes and for a claim to the gratitude of their constituents.

The statute dealt with a most difficult subject. The members of the Congress that passed it knew that it was a difficult subject. They made plain the object that they had in mind, and they used general expressions to accomplish it which they thought had had definition in existing law. The evil to be remedied was manifest, and they pursued the legislative course so often pursued before, of trusting to the learned, just, and equitable construction of the courts to effect their legislative intention.

I had purposed to review or refer to certain portions of the addresses which have been made on this measure, particularly by those supporting the report of the majority, but I shall not take the time. I cordially commend to my fellow Members the reading of the conclusion of the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] with reference to the effect that this bill is going to have on business. I noted the carefully prepared speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MITCHELL], and I wish to direct your attention for a moment to one or two thoughts in connection with his remarks. It was a quiet, dignified address. It was conservative, and such an address as one might expect from a gentleman of his knowledge and information. He says, however:

I have been a member of other legislative bodies, Mr. Chairman, in the days gone by, and I have never served upon any committee that sought, as this committee has sought, the light and the aid of counsel and the assistance of business men from every section of the country. Why, Mr. Chairman, we counseled with the minority Members upon the committee in the perfection of this bill. Why, Mr. Chairman, we prepared three tentative drafts of this bill, and I believe that every member of the committee, Republicans as well as Progressives, offered suggestions in connection with this legislation.

I respectfully dissent from the statement made by the gentleman with reference to the freedom that was given to the minority members to follow these bills as they were secretly prepared one after the other, and then flashed upon us as a whole; to the statement that we had an opportunity to make suggestions to them in order to reform what we thought was erroneous. On the contrary, three of our very distinguished and able Members framed these measures by and with the advice of the Executive of this Nation. Mr. Chairman, one of the things that grates harshly upon my sense of the proprieties in this legislative body is the intrusion of Executive suggestion and enforcement upon the acts of this deliberative body. [Applause on the Republican side.] I feel that the power of this House ought to be to originate and pass legislation.

The President may and ought to send us his suggestions from time to time in proper shape, or if he wishes to appear upon the rostrum and read them, then come and read them to us, but when that is done the power of legislation ought to be in the bosom or the heads of the men who are here on this floor representing their constituencies, and obligated by their oaths and by their duty to perform the legislative functions. But we have seen from the beginning to the end of this Congress the domination of the Executive power over this body, compelling legislation willy-nilly. Why, Mr. Chairman, men on this floor have said, when a measure was called to their attention, "Yes; I have not changed my mind upon it; when I voted for toll exemptions I agreed that it was right, it was not a subsidy, it was not a violation of the treaty." "Then, why do you not vote now against its repeal?" "Oh, I think I must follow the President—the President insists upon this."

I do not know how far the President insisted upon these several bills, but that they have come from him through this special committee, upon which there was not a single minority member, with his imprimatur thereon, I assert, and challenge contradiction. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MITCHELL] said further:

The President said, among other things:
"What we are purposing to do, therefore, is, happily, not to hamper or interfere with business as enlightened business men prefer to do it, or in any sense to put it under the ban. The antagonism between business and government is over."

Heaven save the mark! I have not yet seen in the proposed legislation any such truths declared or any such cessation realized. He then continues with the quotation from the President, as follows:

We are now about to give expression to the best business judgment of America, to what we know to be the business conscience and honor of the land. The Government and business men are ready to meet each other halfway in a common effort to square business methods with both public opinion and the law. The best-informed men of the business world condemn the methods and processes and consequences of monopoly as we condemn them, and the instinctive judgment of the vast majority of business men everywhere goes with them. We shall now be their spokesmen. That is the strength of our position and the sure prophecy of what will ensue when our reasonable work is done.

Mr. Chairman, are these measures the expression of the wishes of the great public? Out of a multitude of letters received let me read you two extracts. One is from the agent of a large number of cotton mills in the South, an important business man, whose word is veracity itself:

The attitude of the national administration, in my opinion, will result in greatly increased additions to the present bankrupt industrial enterprises of the recent past, and the result of this national legislation has certainly been to take away all inclination among business men and capitalists to do any more than routine transactions. Without an inclination to do business, I believe there can be no real prosperity in the country.

Further, I am firmly convinced that if the fundamental conditions of the generally abundant crops had not existed the discouragement and the depression into which the business world has been forced since the early commencement of the tariff discussion and the adverse national legislation there would have been, in effect, a practical panic, which I fear may still come upon us all unless business in general is given the rest which you advocate.

Among the cotton manufacturers in general, both North and South, with whom I come more fully in contact, the present question is not on what goods can we run our mills and make a profit, but how can we run our mills at the smallest possible loss and still not cause the operatives to be thrown out of employment. In the end, I believe, however, that a large proportion of the mills, both North and South, will have to shut down or else run only on part time, or else frankly tell their operatives that under the present conditions brought about through national legislation they will have to accept a largely decreased wage or else not work at all.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have not the time, really.

Mr. HOWARD. I would like to ask the gentleman who the author of that letter is?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to giving it, for the letter, while addressed to me personally, I do not consider a confidential communication. It is Mr. Henry A. Haines, of Haines, Morehouse & Woodford, of New York City.

Mr. HOWARD. The statement was so inconsistent with the facts that I thought the gentleman might put it in the RECORD, because these mills are running full time all the time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's conduct in asking me to yield for the purpose of making such an expression as that is so inconsistent with ethics and high sense of honor that I pass it by without notice. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, I withdraw the statement, then.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Then I accept the gentleman's apology.

Mr. HOWARD. I said the letter, not the statement.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I believe the statement to be true, and from my own personal contact with business men I find more murmurings of what is coming than the people who shut their ears are willing to admit. I can point to a dozen instances where that idea of disinclination to do anything is holding back. I can point to a dozen manufacturers, one of whom only on Saturday afternoon told me, "I am only trying to keep my organization together and run my mill without suffering too much loss." The competition that is coming to him and others will have its effect; and that effect, unless it is checked, is going to write upon the business of this country in many departments the word "disaster."

Mr. METZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I yield for a question.

Mr. METZ. Does not the gentleman know that there are hundreds of corporations, dozens of them, running at a positive loss to-day just to keep their help together?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That is absolutely true.

Mr. METZ. Just to keep their help going and nothing else? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No one but him who will not understand it, who does not wish to understand it, will assert the contrary.

Now, with reference to that which concerns the banking interests of the country, I have a letter here, signed by the Philadelphia Clearing House Association, and to it are appended the names of some of our best citizens, men of the highest character and integrity.

The letter is too long for me to read, but I am going to ask permission at the close of my remarks to extend it in the RECORD. I believe I have that permission; but it sets forth how the entire banking interests in a city that has not been accused of maintaining Wall Street or sustaining a Morgan, but a conservative city, where capital has been handled fairly for business interests, how these men tremble at the prospect of legislation which you propose with reference to banks, and they plead that they——

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman give the date of the letters?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes. The first one I read was under date of May 16, 1914, and the one which I have not read, but placed in the RECORD, is under date of May 22, 1914, and is as follows:

MAY 22, 1914.

To the COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
House of Representatives of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Representing the associated national banks of the city of Philadelphia, all of which have joined the new Federal reserve system and subscribed their proportion to the Federal reserve regional bank, we respectfully ask careful consideration by you of those provisions of the bill now before you (H. R. 15657) relating to interlocking directorates between national banks, State banks, trust companies, and certain other corporations, and the elimination thereby of certain existent corporate features in banking of the most vital import to this community and to the banks thereof, as well as to those of all cities and larger towns.

The motive prompting the introduction of the interlocking directorate feature into this new statute, as we understand it, seems to be the hoped-for correction of certain abuses which it is alleged have crept into banking and more particularly into the extension of credit, and which it is further urged have curtailed competition.

In seeking to correct what has been claimed as an evil existing in one part of the country, a vital injury in the sum total may be done to the great mass of our banking institutions and to the community at large by the enactment of this law, and beyond that we believe irreparable harm will result to the regional bank system as a whole. This system should not be weighted down with unwise laws, but should be left to work out its problem untrammeled. By its merits it should attract the widest and strongest support—should draw to it through the advantages it offers every factor which makes for the larger success.

Here in Philadelphia through a long term of years we can not recall an instance in which interlocking directorates have prevented fair and reasonable competition or curtailed in any way the credit of any individual entitled to credit.

The act, as proposed, will affect many of our strongest boards of directors here in Philadelphia; in many instances it will practically destroy them. Many of these men are allied with vigorous trust companies and other important interests; these connections are not in competition in the proper sense of the word, but, on the contrary, are most helpful in promoting the general welfare of the banking community. A compulsory choice in these instances between a trust company and a bank will result in favor of the trust company, and thus weaken the management of many of the member banks of the regional system.

Can Congress afford to force this new legislation upon the country and lower the vigor and tone of the regional system at the start? This system has yet to be "tried out," and its success is not by any means beyond peradventure.

The national banks have with surprising unanimity entered this system, but neither you nor we should permit that fact to deceive us. Already there exists a feeling that later we may be disillusioned. Is it wise for Congress to add now any element which may increase the doubt and unrest which are in the thoughts of hundreds of bank managements not now able to measure the results of the Federal reserve act, and which managements have assented with the purpose of trying out the plan in all fairness to it and to themselves?

Bankers in considerable numbers in various smaller towns are quietly expressing themselves in this way. They can make no forecast at this time of the advantages or disadvantages which will or will not accrue to their locality. They have elected to enter the system, knowing they can later go over to the State system if they prefer.

The State systems are growing with rapid strides in many sections of the country, outstripping the national banks in number and prestige, while it is worthy of note that our State banks and trust companies are not overstrenuous in their efforts to adopt the regional plan. Does it not therefore behoove Congress and all real friends of the regional system to move in a manner calculated to attract to that system strong banks and the strong, trained men of the country, rather than to repel, and by legislating drive these men out of the managements in which they are needed? Does it not seem the part of business acumen that in the first days of this new Federal system a confidence should be generated that would weld together a great mass of strong banks and strong men rather than that timidity and alarm should disintegrate it in whole or in part?

The ranks of well-equipped bank directors will never be overcrowded; these men are born of experience—they are not overnight products.

One of the hard problems confronting the bankers of to-day is to select new directors for their banks—men who have the training, the influence, and the analytical equipment to insure the safe extension of credit and proper care of depositors' money.

The causes for the collapse of a multitude of banks in this country reveal that the great majority have been wrecked through bad loans—loans permitted or recommended by directors thoroughly honest, but lacking the trained ability to judge credits. It takes years of experience to make a safe credit man.

We earnestly urge that Congress most carefully balance this whole problem, and that in trying to remedy one evil (possibly overestimated) a condition shall not be created which shall be far more harmful.

We respectfully submit that it is unwise to harass the country with too many new experiments, phases, and standards at one time. Let this new banking system, which has so much of merit in it, not be weakened by trying out too many theoretical problems; if this occur, in the end the unexpected may happen, and we may see the whole system thrown into financial discord.

This act prohibiting interlocking bank directorates, if enacted into law, will do more to tear down and lower the tone of bank management in this country than anything which has occurred in all the years gone by.

We beg to suggest it is but fair to the clean, straight bankers of this country, who probably represent nearly 100 per cent of the profession, and who have all through these years transacted a strictly uplifting, legitimate, honorable business, that they be not forced to replace tried, efficient directors of influence with men of inexperience during a period in which the acid tests are being applied to the new banking system.

Respectfully submitted.

The Philadelphia Clearing House Association, Joseph Moore, jr., president; Jno. C. Boyd, secretary; L. L. Rue, J. R. McAllister, E. F. Shanbacker, Chas. S. Calwell, S. S. Sharp, Effingham B. Morris, W. G. Elliott, Joseph Wayne, jr., committee.

Now, when my learned friend read that extract from the President, and I give you, by way of contrast, the plaintive appeal that comes up from business, I ask you, if this committee is carrying out the language, the intent, and purpose of the presidential message, are they giving peace and rest to the business world? The keynote that runs through all these speeches, without enumerating them, is that the President said thus and so. We are writing into the law what the President desired. Now, the illustration—and I refer to the gentleman from Massachusetts only as a type of the use being inapplicable. He quotes three cases from the courts of Massachusetts, each one of which relates to an instance where clearly the facts as stated forces the conclusion that it was a violation of the common law against monopoly and restraint of trade. Not one of his illustrations fits the single issue raised by the bill that is before this House. I wish I had time to refer to them and analyze them. Now, along the same line comes an illustration from my friend and colleague from Pennsylvania, where he speaks of the Colby mines. I said to myself when reading his illustration. Is it possible that a gentleman on the floor of this House would use an illustration like that and then say that that is a picture of the mining industry of this country? How far from the facts. I do not know whether the Colby incident is true or false. I assume that he would not have uttered it unless he had some foundation in fact for it, but I do know these figures are inapplicable to any mining institution or corporation of which I have the slightest knowledge, and I have knowledge of a very great many. Take the soft-coal industry of West Virginia. The royalties there run from 8 to 10 cents a ton, which are reasonable, as any sane man must admit. The cost of labor is 65 to 70 cents, and when the mine owner is able to get 10 or 15 cents profit on a ton for all the capital he has invested and the risk he runs, that is all the compensation he receives.

Now, the picture of the Colby mine incident stands out in sharp contrast with the truth. Let me clear away in a sentence one other thing. A good deal of time has been given to discussion of monopoly. Men's voices were mellowed. I fancied as I read those speeches I could almost hear the tremble in the voices and see tears in the eyes as they pictured this monstrosity of monopoly and restraint of trade. What has that to do with the question that we are considering? We have all, in our platforms, in our actions, in our votes, condemned monopoly and restraint of trade, and so let us start on an even keel. We are just as full of energy to destroy monopoly and to restrain trade as you or any other persons who have anything to do with legislation or the formation of our laws. All these things should be swept aside in the forum of our reason and we should take the language of this law and ask ourselves this question: Does this law add anything to the Sherman antitrust law that will be beneficial to the community, or does it create doubts which will make the business world uncertain, or does it run the risk of inflicting conditions upon the men in the smaller businesses that will destroy their hopes and probably destroy their enterprises? That is the single question. I have not the time now to do it, but I hope to advert to some of these things under the five-minute rule when we come to consider the question of amendment. Discrimination in prices, tying up by contracts, holding companies, interlocking directorates, those are the things that the committee have aimed their shafts at instead of doing what I said in the beginning—take the scientific principle of legislation, which is to define crime, and not attempt to legislate upon individual instances. The law against interlocking directorates, while there have been evils under that system such as the ones that are pointed out in the Pujo investigation, yet there is not one but can be reached under the Sherman antitrust law and destroyed—not one. Every evil that is pictured as flowing from interlocking directorates can be reached under that law.

Now, then, our committee stands in this position. If a man——

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Not until I am through with this. If a man took a spade and struck another man over the head with it, crushing his skull and killing him instantly, in a frenzy of reform our Judiciary Committee meets and it passes a law saying that henceforth no man shall ever carry or use a spade. That would be about as logical as it is to say that henceforth there shall be no interlocking directorates because of the fact that in some instances the money power has controlled through interlocking directorates. On the general definition that whatever creates a monopoly or tends to create it, whatever is in restraint of commerce, is within the grasp of the law, an energetic prosecution can produce results that will destroy all these things without this singular kind of detail legislation.

Now, I have only a word or two to say in the balance of my time.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield a minute?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I really have not the time. I want to finish.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I wish the gentleman would wait.

Mr. QUIN. I do not want to interrupt you. I only want an answer to this.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have not the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Take the case of discrimination in price, and I only want to say a few words about that. We ought as legislators to try as little as possible to invade the freedom of business. That is an axiomatic truth that ought to lie at the root of all legislation.

Some of us, I fear, are so eager to accomplish something that may look like being drastic reforms that we trample this primary principle under foot and pay no attention to it. It is a natural right of a man to fix prices for the commodities which he has to sell. It is a business liberty that ought not to be lightly taken from him, and I conceive of but two instances in which it ought to be regulated by law. One is when the exercise of a public right is concerned—a public-service corporation. The other is where a monopoly has been created and the welfare of the community is threatened by it. But this proposed legislation says that if he fixes a price here differing from the price he fixes yonder, and if it tends to injure or destroy a competitor, he is guilty of a crime. Competition, my friends, is war. Competition, if it means anything, is the taking from another what he has, through the avenue of trade. Your Supreme Court has said, the law as written has said, that competition is the normal and natural thing for which we must contend—it is the genius of our antitrust legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Compete? Why, when something is ordered to be sold at auction, there you have competition. If you are endeavoring to make a contract and you invite bids, there you have competition—one bids at so much, and another bids at so much, in order to reach a result. But this drastic legislation, in my judgment, would destroy the liberty of business, and it would make a condition that would involve business in serious trouble. Take the man of large business, and say that his business is assailed at one point—we will say Chicago—and under this law he must lower his price all over the United States. He dare not meet competition in Chicago, which is his lawful right to do, in the place where he is assailed, but you put a handicap and burden upon him because he is big. God has made big men, big measures, big mountains, and lots of big things, and never put a single stamp of disapproval upon them. As long as they are confined within legal limits and are not monopolistic and do not restrain trade they are often the result and complement of success and genius and power, and they ought to be respected. [Applause.] But you are going to place upon them the handicap of saying that they must keep their prices at such a point or pay $5,000 and be incarcerated in jail. God help the liberty of business under such discrimination. [Applause.]

I could give you a dozen illustrations. Suppose a man is short of money and must have it. In order to get it he must sell quickly. He goes out and makes a price at which he sells, below the price at which he sells in other places. Would you put upon him the duty of selling the article at the same price everywhere? And that is what this act would do, namely, make him sell everywhere at the same price. Yes; but the committee says this must be done with the intent to wrongfully injure or destroy. And that word "wrongfully" was carried into the last edition of that statute—I do not know when, how, or under what circumstances; but it is there, and I accept it. It is an axiomatic truth and the law that every man is intended, or is presumed to have intended, the natural consequence of his act. Now, the natural consequence of my act, if I sell at a lower price and take business from my neighbor, is to injure him pro tanto. I injure him. And yet this question is to be left to a jury as to whether it is a wrongful injury or not. The peril of a business man thus exposed is very, very great. There are a thousand other instances of the same kind.

Take the tying-up contract paragraph. You destroy agency, except where you have an exclusive agent that does nothing else—and I believe that is consistent with the language of this act—but you take away from the business man the right, if he has a new commodity, to go into a place and say, "I wish you, sir, to take this and handle it for me. I wish to gain a foothold in this business community, and I will sell to nobody else if you will only sell for me." But because that man deals in other articles you take away from him and the seller the liberty of making such a contract which honorable methods time out of mind have consistently approved of.

Take your holding-company provision, and the only people that it will hurt will be the small holding companies. Three or four men are engaged, for instance, in mining coal in West Virginia. They have leases. They can not consolidate their three companies, and yet the same group of men own every share of stock in those companies. It is their property. The whole three put together would not constitute a monopoly or restraint of trade, and no movement would be made against them. But you would forbid them from holding this stock in a holding company. You would forbid them from controlling it by interlocking directorates, and you leave them helpless, unless they put dummies in to look after their property. That is the position in which this bill places small business, and I tell you that the small business of the country runs up into hundreds of thousands of corporations, and every one of them would more or less be affected by this unscientific legislation.

I wish I could take up in detail the other provisions of this bill, but I have already consumed more time than I expected, and I will reserve what little individual criticism of specific sections I may have to make to the time when the bill itself is up for amendment. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I would not consume a moment of the time of the House were it not for the fact that I would like to reply in my own time to the contents of a letter read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. The letter I have reference to is the Haines letter, in which are contained certain statements as to the condition of the cotton-mill industry in the South.

I simply want to state that from my own knowledge practically every mill in my State and in my district now is in full operation. Some of them are running "night shifts," as they are called, and none of them has been suspended by fear of intended legislation [applause on the Democratic side] or by the action of the tariff upon these industries.

But my main object in injecting myself into this debate at this time is this: The gentleman from Pennsylvania, after I had stated that the letter of Mr. Haines was inconsistent with the facts, severely criticized me for injecting that into the RECORD. I very promptly withdrew it, as the gentleman seemed to be so jealous of congressional ethics, and said that I had grossly violated the ethics of debate. I want to say now and reassert that I did not intend to offensively inject myself into the gentleman's debate, but I do want to reiterate that every word of the statement made in that letter about the cotton-mill industry in the South is absolutely unfounded in fact. It is another of those Republican bugaboos that they find on the side of the road every time we seek to control big business in this country, which has run rampant over the people for the last 16 years under Republican rule. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GARNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had, on May 25, 1914, approved and signed bills of the following titles:

H. R. 16508. An act making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1914, and for other purposes;

S. 65. An act to amend an act entitled "An act providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof," approved April 12, 1910;

S. 1243. An act directing the issuance of patent to John Russell; and

S. 5289. An act to provide for warning signals on vessels working on wrecks or engaged in dredging or other submarine work, and to amend section 2 of the act approved June 7, 1897, entitled "An act to adopt regulations for preventing collisions upon certain harbors, rivers, and inland waters of the United States."

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the very remarkable speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], and would not in the brief time of 15 minutes undertake to reply to the argument which he advanced. But, with the indulgence of the House, I do desire briefly to refer to some of the thoughts which he expressed.

I assume that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is the spokesman of the Republican side of the House on this bill, and that their whole argument and case may be judged by what he had to say. I assume this not only because of the liberal time awarded him, but also by reason of the fact that the minority report, and the objections urged against this bill, is filed in the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I was not amused nor was I surprised at the very remarkable plea made by the gentleman in behalf of big business. Just such pleas and arguments have brought the Republican Party to the desperate straits in which it finds itself to-day. The whole argument of the gentleman is summed up very briefly in a few paragraphs in the minority views which are filed with the majority report. In the minority report I find in two or three paragraphs the whole contention relied upon by gentlemen on that side and elaborated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Here is one:

> The antitrust laws on the statute book at this time have been carefully considered by the Supreme Court and judicially interpreted through a period of 24 years, and if properly enforced are believed by us to strip corporations and trusts of any power to injure or oppress.

I want to tarry just here long enough to comment upon the thought expressed, that these laws have been in force 24 years, have been interpreted by the Supreme Court, and "if properly enforced are believed by us to strip corporations and trusts of any power to injure or oppress." I want to ask, and I wish some gentleman unfriendly to this bill, somebody on that side of this House, would answer this question: Why has not this law been properly enforced, and why do you now, after 24 years, have to come to the country and appeal for time in which to demonstrate its effectiveness and its force?

Now, it will not do to reply that the Democratic Party and the present administration have been charged with this responsibility. We will be now and in the future, I trust, for many years to come. What I charge is that for 16 years, at least, of the lifetime of the Sherman antitrust law there has been but very little effort, if any, made to enforce it upon the part of those who have been charged with responsibility and are to-day claiming credit for it and standing as its sponsors. Let me read further:

> The proposed legislation contains many new phrases and sets up new standards, all of which would require a period of years of interpretation by the courts before their full meaning can be definitely known by the business world.
> It is very undesirable to bring about such a period of uncertainty and doubt to worry and harass the business of the country.

Great solicitude for the business of the country, and it is in behalf of the business of the country that their plea for big business is heard. In that argument we find gentlemen seeking to delay or to defeat, if you please, the proposed bill.

Now, the gentleman criticized the fact that no amendments could be effected on the floor of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] went so far as to say that important amendments to this bill are necessary; but he and his colleagues filed a minority report without indicating or recommending a single amendment. The gentleman himself made a speech of one hour, and, except by general phrase, did not indicate nor propose a single amendment and afforded no light to this House as to wherein this bill is defective and requires amendment.

His whole argument is in keeping with the remark the other day by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the minority leader, when he said whether or not he would vote for the proposed amendment to section 7—the labor section—depended upon whether he could do more mischief to the Democratic Party by voting for or against the amendment. He used this language. I read from the RECORD of May 19:

> The bill contains this provision:
> "That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers, agricultural, or horticultural organizations "—
> And so forth. Some gentlemen desire to change that to provide that nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall apply to these organizations.

When interrogated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] whether he would vote for such an amendment, he evaded the question in every possible way until pressed, when he replied: "How I stand now will depend very largely upon whether I can make more mischief on your side of the House by voting one way or the other."

Has it comes to this—that the old Republican Party, which boasts of its 50 years of splendid history, shall determine public questions solely from party expediency and its leader vote for or against an amendment vital to the interest of labor, and determine that vote by the effect it may have on the political situation? Has it come to this—that the Republican leader has so far lost his sense of propriety and patriotism that he will sacrifice the interests of labor for party gain and party advantage?

The whole argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] along the same line was to criticize and condemn, without suggesting a single remedy or a single amendment that might be of use or benefit.

Let me read further from the minority report:

No possible good can come from constant interference with business. It is our belief that business should have a rest from further legislation and be given an opportunity to adjust itself to the environment created by the existing antitrust laws as the same have been interpreted and are now being administered.

Oh, what a plea! The Sherman Act has been on the statute books for a quarter of a century, during which time it has been ineffective or inoperative by reason of lax enforcement. I will not say that former administrations have been wholly void in their efforts to enforce the law, but I will say that the Department of Justice has not been very diligent in that direction. I will do the Republican Party the favor to say that the fault does not wholly lie in the failure to enforce the law. The law itself in many respects is weak and needs amendment. That is the very purpose of this bill, and I must contend that it does not come with good grace from those who have been responsible for the failure of the law in the past to oppose amendment on the pretext that it will disturb business. No one has any disposition to disturb honest industry or legitimate business, and such business can not and will not be disturbed by any effort to amend and render more effective the antitrust law. The kind of business that will take alarm and scamper to cover is the big offender, in behalf of whom appeals are made on this floor from that side of the Chamber, from which source such appeals have emanated since the birth of the Sherman antitrust law, and which appeals have done more than any other one thing to render the law ineffective and inoperative. We are now told, after this lapse of time, that business has just learned what the law means, and all that it asks is a further lease of time, a longer day of grace within which to conform and adjust itself to the law. I assume that it was immaterial what the law meant under the preceding administrations, and that business was not concerned to know what the law meant; but to the extent that the law is effective, it has become all at once very important, indeed, to business not only to know what the law means but to readily and properly conform and adjust itself to the law.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have heard much said in the course of this debate about the effect on business and business conditions throughout the country. You have heard letters read just now, by means of which the impression is sought to be left upon the House and the country that the Democratic Party has materially interfered with the business of the country. Now, I represent a State whose interests are largely agricultural. I represent in part the State of Illinois. I have seen much in the papers of late about the effect of our recent tariff legislation on prices, and to-day I procured from the Secretary of Agriculture some figures which I want to submit here in answer to the contention that the country is in need of a rest.

The argument which is urged here most strongly is that business needs a rest. Let me show you what Democratic legislation has done to disturb the business interests of the country. These figures speak louder than any language that I or others might employ.

I have here two columns of figures, one taken from the market reports of May 23, 1913, the other from the market reports of May 23, 1914, the corresponding date one year later. Here they are:

May 23, 1913, contract wheat for May in the Chicago market was 91 and 92 cents a bushel. In 1914, on the corresponding date, it was 97⅝ to 98 cents a bushel.

Now, after the tariff bill has been in operation all these months wheat is 7 and 8 cents a bushel higher in the Chicago market than it was one year ago.

Contract corn, May 23, 1913, 57¼ to 58½ cents per bushel. One year later, on the corresponding date of 1914, contract corn 69⅝ to 70 cents per bushel; that is, corn to-day is 12 cents a bushel higher than it was a year ago, before the tariff bill became a law.

Of all the extravagant statements and wild-eyed clamor which has been indulged in for political effect within my recollection the most silly and ridiculous has been the statements and arguments advanced that the American farmer through the Central West is about to be ruined by the importation of Argentine corn. That contention is the most absurd and nonsensical clap-trap that I ever heard emanate from intelligent sources. Anyone who has seen a sample of Argentine corn will reach the prompt conclusion that no danger of competition or rivalry can ever result from its importation. Its use could only be occasioned by necessity arising from a famine or shortage at home which would compel its substitution and use. Men do not import corn for fun, and it will only be brought to our markets when the price at home, because of a shortage of our own crop, is so great as to attract or induce it. A trivial amount of such corn has been brought to our ports within the last few months, but it has not found any ready demand and has not in the least affected the market price of the domestic article. The 10,000,000 bushels which within a few months have been imported is but a drop in the bucket, and had about as much effect on the market price as an extra steer butchered in the Chicago stockyards would have on the price of beef for the day. Our production of corn amounts to over two and a half billion bushels per year, and it is utter nonsense for anyone to urge or contend that the pitiful amount of 10,000,000 bushels more or less could affect the market price of so large a yield and production. The price of corn above quoted is a complete answer and refutation of all contention and argument that Argentine corn is a source of competition, menace, or danger to the American farmer.

Rye, May 23, 1913, 63½ cents per bushel; in May, 1914, 66 cents per bushel.

Cattle, May 23, 1913, beef steers, per hundredweight, $7.90 to $9.10; May, 1914, one year later, $8.40 to $9.50.

Sheep, in May, 1913, $5.25 to $8.25 per head; in May, 1914, $5.75 to $8.85 per head.

Live hogs, May 23, 1913, $8.15 to $8.75; May 23, 1914, $8.40 to $8.50.

These are some of the products of the American farm, and the price of every one of them is higher than it was one year ago.

I might here to advantage recall to the attention of gentlemen on the floor the argument urged in this Hall one year ago, when it was proclaimed with great force that we would ruin the wool industry in this country if we placed wool on the free list. We did not heed the warning, and are now gratified to bring to this House the assuring information that the industry is not ruined, and that not only sheep but wool is selling in the market to-day for a greater price than the same product sold for one year ago. Let some gentleman answer and explain this proposition in the light of the arguments advanced on that side of the Chamber last summer.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. My colleague does not contend that the lowering of the duty on these various products has caused the price to go up to the American farmer, does he?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not contend that, but this I do contend: While the price of farm products has gone up in every particular, the price of the finished product and the essentials of every man's table have gone down. Do you doubt it? Let me call your attention to these figures: One year ago the price of pork per barrel was $20.37½ to $20.50; to-day it is $19.90. While the price of hogs has gone up the price of pork, the finished product, has gone down. Lard was $11.10 a hundred pounds a year ago; to-day it is $9.95. Yet the price of hogs has gone up.

Short ribs were $11.50 to $12.12½ one year ago, while to-day they are $11.20 to $11.22½. While the price to the farmer has gone up, the price of the product for the poor man's table has gone down.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. The gentleman said he would like to have some explanation of that fact.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but not in my time. If the gentleman has a question, I will answer it.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. May not that condition which the gentleman has explained be the result of the fact that the earning capacity of the great mass of the people is less now and they can not pay so much, and hence the price has gone down?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman's premises are false. The gentleman is assuming a thing that is not true. Wages to-day average higher than they did one year ago, and the facts and figures will prove it.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. One more question: Does the gentleman claim there are more people employed than there were one year ago, and does not that have some effect?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can only speak for my own part of the country. There is no complaint there. Every man who wants work gets it. No men are seeking work, but employers are seeking help. That is true in the State of Illinois.

Now, let me call your attention to the prices of three or four more articles of table necessity in the New York market. Take sugar, for instance. There is reason for that. We took the tariff off sugar, and it is cheaper. May 21, 1913, it was 4.2 cents a pound, while to-day it is 4.1 cents a pound.

Coffee, Rio No. 7, May 21, 1913, was 11½ cents and May 21, 1914, it was 8¾ cents.

Tea, Formosa, May 21, 1913, was 14½ cents and May 21, 1914, 13½ cents.

Rice, May 21, 1913, 4⅛ cents; May 21, 1914, 4 cents.

These figures and articles can be indefinitely multiplied. Market prices to the American producer have increased; the average is higher than it was a year ago, and the prices of the necessities of life that must go to supply the table have decreased, and the general average is lower than it was a year ago. These are facts that I want somebody to answer. Until they are sufficiently answered no argument upon that side to the effect that we are disturbing business can affect the result or our duty with reference to this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCGILLICUDDY], a member of the committee.

Mr. MCGILLICUDDY. Mr. Chairman, if the Democratic Party, in addition to tariff reform as exemplified in the Underwood bill and currency and banking reform as exemplified in the banking and currency bill shall pass these antitrust bills at the present session of Congress, it will have created more constructive legislation in one session of Congress than any other political party in the history of our country.

I have listened with much pleasure and profit to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. The burden of his song is that the small interests in this country will suffer if this bill is passed. That is an old-time trust argument. Whenever you touch monopoly and the trusts, their cry immediately goes up that you are not hurting them, but the small business interests of the country. Whenever you hear this tender solicitude on the part of the trusts for small interests and small business you can be pretty sure you are getting the probe on the right spot. When I heard our friend from Pennsylvania he had a suspicious look in his eye that while he was talking about the small interests he was really interested in something bigger than the small interests of this country. It is akin to another complaint that I have heard in this House against this bill. I heard a gentleman say here the other day that the Democrats were bringing this forward as a matter of politics, because the tariff bill did not reduce the cost of living and high prices in this country as they promised to do.

Now, if our political opponents undertake to state the Democratic position, I hold that they ought to do it fairly. The Democratic Party never said that under present conditions the reduction of the tariff alone would accomplish the desired reduction in high prices in this country. The tariff is only one of the prime causes of high prices. Monopolistic power and trust control of production and prices the Democratic Party realized as most potent factors in high prices, and promised the country to reform and correct them. The tariff, of course, is intimately related. In fact, the trust itself in this country is the legitimate child of high tariff. It developed from the tariff as direct as the fruit from the blossom. In relation to high prices the two are interlocking, and both must be treated before relief is obtained.

It is well for us to see exactly what the Democratic Party did say about that, and I quote from the platform of 1912:

> The high cost of living is a serious problem in every American home. The Republican Party, in its platform, attempts to escape from responsibility for present conditions by denying that they are due to a protective tariff. We take issue with them on this subject, and charge that excessive prices result in a large measure from the high tariff laws enacted and maintained by the Republican Party, and from trusts and commercial conspiracies fostered and encouraged by such laws, and we assert that no substantial relief can be secured for the people without import duties on the necessaries of life are materially reduced and these criminal conspiracies broken up.
> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

The Democratic Party has revised the tariff downward in good faith with the people, precisely as that party promised that it would, and it is now on its way to fulfill its other great promise by the passage of this antitrust bill. It will fulfill it, and in the words of the Democratic platform, it will make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

I have listened to the attacks upon this bill from the Republican side of the Chamber. I find them in neither harmony nor agreement in the line of attack. If there was anything fundamentally wrong with the bill you can be assured that its opponents would have discovered it and united on a common ground of attack upon it.

If I felt there was any coherence in the Republican opposition to this bill I should have some fears about it, for I respect the arguments and I respect the integrity of our Republican friends; but I hear a portion of them, intelligent, patriotic men, telling us that this bill is too radical, that it goes too far, that it will be destructive, and I hear responding to it another portion of the same party, equally intelligent and patriotic, telling us that it is too neutral, too conservative, that it will not accomplish anything in the way of reform legislation. My belief is that if there was anything inherently wrong about the bill our opponents would be in substantial agreement in their grounds of opposition. They are not in harmony in opposition to the bill for the reason that they are unable to make common cause against it, and I am convinced that the bill as a whole is safe, practical, and rational, and that is precisely the kind of a bill the Democratic committee started out to frame.

No committee could construct a bill that would be satisfactory to everybody in the country. That is not to be expected. No group of men could write such a bill. It is not expected that this bill will correct every possible evil of trust conditions that oppress the people of this country. But that it is a long step in the right direction and will correct the great trust evils that oppress the people there can be no reasonable doubt in the mind of any fair and impartial man.

The Democratic Party should have a fair chance with reference to this legislation. You can not correct in a day the trust evils that have been steadily growing and gathering strength for the past 30 years. These evils in this country have become deep rooted, widespread, and are guarded by combinations of wealth and power unequaled on the face of the globe. They have not only controlled the business of the country, but its politics as well. Their giant forms have stalked into the legislatures of the States and even into the Congress of the Nation, compelling their will to be done. The executives of the States and Nation have not been free from their attacks, and it is even feared by the people that their sinister influence has made itself felt in the courts of the country. To right such wrongs, to correct such evils, is no holiday task.

I have said that the Democratic Party should have a fair chance with reference to this legislation. I believe the people of the country have confidence in President Wilson and his administration. That they will not only be fair and reasonable with the administration in the face of this stupendous task, but that they will be patient, knowing that efforts are being made in the best of good faith to bring back to the people that which was theirs but which they have lost. It would be easy, indeed, to draw a radical antitrust bill, regardless of its consequences. It would be equally easy to draw a neutral, meaningless measure that hurt nobody and accomplished nothing. But this was not the purpose of your Judiciary Committee nor the spirit in which they approached the task. To draw a bill that would be at once rational and practical, that would right the wrongs and correct the evils aimed at, and not injure or destroy any legitimate business in the country is our purpose. We believe it is safer to take one step less than to go one step too far.

It is easy to criticize but difficult to construct legislation. It certainly does not lie in the mouths of our Republican friends to criticize our legislation when for 16 years they had full power themselves to give the country relief by way of amendment to the Sherman law and never lifted a finger to do it. They not only failed to amend the law, but they failed to enforce it.

For 16 years prior to the inauguration of President Wilson's administration the Republican Party controlled the House, the Senate, and the Presidency. It could enact into law any legislation it saw fit. Yet during all that time it never added a single line of antitrust legislation to the statues of the country. The best possible proof that the Republican Party would do nothing to eradicate trust evils in this country is that it did not and would not do it when it had the chance.

Yet in that 16 years of uninterrupted and complete power there was a perfect saturnalia of trust expansion and development in the country, such as was never heard of in all its previous history.

GROWTH OF THE TRUSTS.

The climax of trust conditions and evils in this country was reached between the years 1897 and 1904. Previous to 1897 there were not more than 60 concerns in this entire country that dominated the industries in which they were engaged. In the next three years following 1897 there were 183 gigantic combinations formed in this country under Republican administration, every one of them dominating the industry under which they were formed. In the one year of 1899 alone there were 79 of these combinations formed, with a capitalization of more than $4,000,000,000. It is estimated that these combinations comprised one-seventh of the entire manufacturing industry in our country and one-twentieth of all the wealth that existed in our country at that time, nearly twice the amount of money in circulation in the country, and more than four times the capitalization of all the manufacturing corporations that were organized from 1860 down to 1893.

This was the period in which the holding company was developed, an organization and scheme that trust attorneys conceived would absolutely defy the law. Now, I say that when that condition of things existed, one of two things ought to have been done—either the Sherman law, if it was adequate, as you now claim, should have been enforced and these gigantic trusts put out of existence, or, if it was found not to be sufficient, then it ought to have been amended so that it would be.

If you had enforced it and it was found not sufficient to prevent interlocking directors, holding companies, overcapitalization, discrimination, and control of prices, and other trust evils, it was within your power to amend it so that it would. If you had done either of these things, corporations and trusts in this country would have gotten down to a competitive basis, or else would have gone out of business as trusts, and free, natural competition would have been restored in the country.

FAILURE TO ENFORCE ANTITRUST LAWS.

As to the enforcement of the antitrust laws by Republican officials for the past 16 years, it is putting it mildly to say that they were at least indifferent. At times the Sherman antitrust law was deliberately ignored and practically considered a dead letter. Why this indifference on the part of public officials during this 16 years of trust development to the enforcement of this most important antitrust statute? It was because public officials whose sworn duty it was to enforce these laws were not selected from circles that were interested in antitrust enforcement. They were men not accustomed to breathe the ozone of an antitrust atmosphere.

Men are very largely influenced by their environments. With this fact in view, it is interesting to see from what circles men have been drawn to enforce the antitrust laws for the past 16 years. Under the present law the Attorney General practically has full control of the prosecutions of trusts. Hence it is a matter of the greatest concern not only to the trusts but to the public as to who fills this important office.

In the summer and fall of 1900 negotiations were under way between J. Pierpont Morgan and his group on the one hand and Andrew Carnegie and his associates on the other, for the formation of the great United States Steel Corporation. By all means the most powerful and important constituent company in the proposed United States Steel Trust was the Carnegie Steel Co., of which Mr. Carnegie was the controlling owner. For years the attorneys of the great Carnegie Steel Co. were Knox & Reed, distinguished and able attorneys, of Pittsburgh, Pa.

During that same summer and fall of 1900 William McKinley was the Republican candidate for President. Mr. McKinley was elected in November and inaugurated March 4, 1901. Philander C. Knox, of the firm of Knox & Reed, was made Attorney General in Mr. McKinley's cabinet, after receiving a very warm letter of recommendation for that position from Mr. Andrew Carnegie. Within 30 days after Mr. Knox was made Attorney General the great United States Steel Corporation, probably the most powerful trust in the world, was organized. Mr. Knox, under the provisions of the antitrust laws of that time, had complete control of antitrust prosecutions. At practically the same time Mr. Knox went into the Cabinet as Attorney General his partner, Judge Reed, was elected a director in the newly formed United States Steel Corporation.

Does anybody think it likely there would be any overwhelming zeal on the part of Attorney General Knox to prosecute the newly formed trust, composed in large and important part of his old client, the Carnegie Steel Co., or to prosecute his old partner, Mr. Reed, who was sitting on the newly formed board of directors of that corporation? If any such zeal ever seized him it was most successfully restrained.

During his entire term as Attorney General no prosecution was ever instituted against the Steel Trust, nor was any such prosecution instituted by his Republican successors until the year 1911, when this House became Democratic as the result of the elections of 1910. One of the first acts of that Democratic Congress of 1911 was to appoint a committee known as the Stanley Committee to investigate the organization, methods, and affairs of the Steel Trust. Within three months after that committee began its investigation and turned the light of publicity upon the organization, methods, and affairs of this company, the then Attorney General commenced prosecution of the Steel Trust under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. The Steel Trust was doing nothing in 1911 that it had not done continuously for the 10 preceding years.

Why was prosecution delayed until a Democratic House aroused the public sentiment of the country by the disclosures of the Stanley Committee?

What is true of the Steel Trust in this regard is only typical of what is true all down the line with reference to trust prosecutions.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICES.

I now want to take up some of the provisions of the bill before the House.

The great ultimate purpose of a trust is to control prices. If it could not control prices, there would be very little object in forming a trust. Experience has shown to every student of the trust problem that one of the most vicious evils of trust domination is the practice of discrimination in prices. The power to discriminate in prices demonstrates the power to control prices.

The practice of discriminating in prices, making prices lower in one community than in another, is, of course, for the purpose of destroying competition. The trusts do not lower prices for the benefit of the public, but to destroy their competitors. As soon as competition is destroyed prices are immediately raised to the old level, or often higher, and thus the people themselves are made to pay the expense of killing competition, and competition is the very thing which under normal conditions would be for the people's benefit. It is a fact that to kill competition trusts have often reduced prices below the cost of production.

Under the bill which we propose this unfair system of price discrimination will be abolished.

Section 2 of the bill provides that any person who shall directly or indirectly discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities in the same or different sections or communities in the United States, or any place under its jurisdiction, for the purpose of destroying or wrongfully injuring the business of a competitor, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. With this rigid provision, no trust would ever dare to resort to the old practice of discriminating in prices in violation of this statute. Especially not when the guilt is made personal and those authorizing the discrimination are subject to the penalties of this bill. When you take the power to discriminate in prices out of the hands of the trusts you take from them one of the most powerful weapons to destroy competition, and consequently to control production and prices.

MINE PRODUCTS.

The next section of the bill, to wit, section 3, I regard as one of the most important in the whole program of antitrust legislation. All of the great trusts in this country, and especially those whose products form the great prime necessaries of life, foresaw the absolute necessity of controlling the raw material from which such products are made. For this reason they seized, in turn, upon the great natural resources of the country. They knew perfectly well whoever controlled these great natural resources controlled, of course, the products for use in daily life made therefrom.

This is particularly true of the great natural resources in the form of mines in the country. For instance, one of the first acts of the Steel Corporation was to get control of the iron ore in the ground, by purchase of the land. With that in its control it bid absolute defiance to competition. The same is true of copper, coal, and nearly all other great mine products. Having control of the mines, under the law as it now stands, they are absolute masters of the situation. They can sell the raw material from their mines to whomsoever they please, and refuse to sell when they please. For instance, if you or I, under the law, to-day go to the mine owners or operators controlling the hard coal in Pennsylvania, with the cash in our hands to purchase coal, the owner or operator can arbitrarily and without any reason absolutely refuse to let us have that great necessary of life. He coldly refers us back to our respective communities, with the information that he is selling coal to certain customers of his there, and we must buy our coal from them, and pay them, of course, the trust-regulated price.

If the bill now before the House becomes law, such practice can no longer be carried out. Under the terms of section 3 it is in substance provided that it shall be unlawful for the owner or operator of any mine, or for any person controlling the product of any mine engaged in selling its product in commerce, to refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to a responsible firm or corporation that may apply for the purchase of the product for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or places under its jurisdiction, and any person violating this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction be punished by a fine of $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

This provision of the bill is founded upon natural justice. Under it if you or I go to some mine owner or operator in Pennsylvania with the cash, or being financially responsible, we can demand that the mine owner sell and deliver to us coal, and he can not arbitrarily refuse to do so. He can no longer turn us back to our local coal dealer and his trust prices as at present. Furthermore, he must sell us coal at the same price he sells it to his other customers without favor or discrimination of any kind. This particular provision of this section will be of inestimable value to the people of my own State. Under the laws of the State of Maine, now held to be constitutional by our Supreme Court, municipalities are authorized, upon the vote of the people, to establish coal and wood yards and furnish fuel to the people at cost. Under the present conditions this law is of little value to our people. If the purchasing agent of such municipality now goes to the mine owner or operator of Pennsylvania he is refused coal and turned over to his local coal dealer for the purchase. Under this bill the purchasing agent of the municipality can go to the mine owner or operator and demand the sale of coal to him; the mine owner can not arbitrarily refuse to do it, and the result is that our municipalities under this bill will get their coal and get it at the same prices coal operators sell to their other customers. It will be readily seen that this operation will result in great and direct benefit to the people of the affected municipalities.

HOLDING COMPANIES.

Another trust evil with which the present bill deals is what is known as the holding company. Under modern trust development this so-called holding company, in the words of the report, is an "abomination." The holding company serves no good purpose. It employs no labor, neither does it produce anything. It adds nothing to the wealth or the welfare of the country. Its sole purpose is to hold the stock of subsidiary corporations in order that it may control the acts of those corporations, and is particularly for the purpose of dividing production among them and controlling and limiting competition. It is, in fact, an ingenious device for a combination of the combines, the product of the shrewdest and ablest trust lawyers to technically comply with the letter of the law while deliberately and flagrantly violating its spirit and intent.

Section 8 of the proposed bill limits the evil of the holding company, so far as it is possible to do so. Present business conditions and experience render it necessary to make certain exceptions; but the bill limits the holding company in its most objectionable feature, namely, its tendency to promote monopoly and restrict or destroy competition.

INTERLOCKING DIRECTORATES.

The next great trust evil to which I wish to refer is that of interlocking directorates.

By means of this vicious practice the business of the country has been practically absorbed by a select and limited coterie of powerful financial magnates. They absolutely control the transportation of the country through control of the railroads; they control the banking institutions of the country, and consequently its credits; and they have very largely succeeded in taking unto themselves the great industrial institutions of the country. They have manipulated stocks and securities, made themselves at once buyers and sellers, borrowers and lenders, between great corporations which they absolutely control. It is needless to elaborate the evil consequences of their deeds. It is particularly needless to us in New England, who are now in the midst of the disasters shown by the pitiable and far-reaching consequences in recent developments in connection with the management of the New Haven and other New England railroads. Interlocking directorates, with all the evil consequences of the system, will become things of the past when this measure becomes law. The shackles will be stricken from transportation, banking, and industrial developments, and an era of free development will follow. The President well stated the benefits of this provision when, in his message, he said the adoption of it will bring new men, new energies, new spirit of initiative, and new blood into the management of our business enterprises. It will open the field of industrial development and origination to scores of men who have been obliged to serve when their abilities entitled them to direct. It will immensely hearten the young men coming on, and will greatly enrich the business activities of the whole country. The President never spoke words more pregnant with true prophecy.

PERSONAL GUILT.

Section 12 of the bill deals with one of the most important of trust conditions, and provides one of the most necessary and important remedies in the whole measure. I refer to the personal-guilt provision of the bill. Under it directors, officers, agents of corporations who have authorized, ordered, or done anything prohibited by the antitrust laws shall be deemed personally guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. This practically transfers the pains and penalties for violations of antitrust laws from the corporation to the individuals responsible for the acts, as it should be.

Fines upon corporations for violations of law are often borne by innocent stockholders, who had no hand or part in the violations; if not upon the stockholders, the amount of the fines is practically taken out of the purchasing public by raising prices to the extent of meeting the fines imposed. In this way the innocent stockholder, or the yet more innocent public, were made to bear the burden of the wrongful acts of the officials of the corporation. Under this bill not the corporation nor the innocent stockholder nor the innocent public are to suffer, but the pain will fall upon the guilty perpetrator where in justice it ought. With the doors of the penitentiary open before them, trust magnates will have a care as to what they do in violation of the antitrust laws.

INJUNCTIVE RELIEF AGAINST THREATENED DAMAGE.

Under the present law any person injured in his business or property by acts in violation of the Sherman antitrust law may recover his damage. In fact, under the provisions of the law he is entitled to recover threefold damage whenever he is able to prove his case. There is no provision under the present law, however, to prevent threatened loss or damage even though it be irreparable. The practical effect of this is that a man would have to sit by and see his business ruined before he could take advantage of his remedy. In what condition is such a man to take up a long and costly lawsuit to defend his rights?

The proposed bill solves this problem for the person, firm, or corporation threatened with loss or damage to property by providing injunctive relief against the threatened act that will cause such loss or damage. Under this most excellent provision a man does not have to wait until he is ruined in his business before he has his remedy. Thus the bill not only protects the individual from loss or damage, but it relieves him of the tremendous burden of long and expensive litigation, often intolerable.

LABOR AND FARMERS' ORGANIZATIONS.

The rights of labor and agricultural organizations are protected under the provisions of this bill as never before by any statute in the history of our country. At the time of the enactment of the Sherman antitrust law nobody dreamed that labor organizations, organized not for profit but solely for bettering conditions for laboring people, were included within its prohibitive provisions. By section 7 of this bill the status of labor organizations is made clear. The dangers of legal dissolution of labor organizations, which by reason of recent court decisions were threatened, cease to exist when this bill becomes law. The bill has been truly called "Labor's bill of rights."

The labor provisions of this bill have been severely criticized in certain quarters. It is my belief that these criticisms have been hasty, ill-considered, and unwarranted. Let us look at the provisions of the bill and see just what it does for labor and labor organizations.

First, it provides that in cases of indirect contempt where the acts complained of would constitute criminal offenses under the law, the defendant on demand may have the right to trial by jury to determine questions of fact.

How long is it since any fair-minded and impartial American citizen would object to a trial by jury on questions of fact? What is there radical or new about that provision? Trial by jury is one of the most sacred of American institutions. It is one of the highest safeguards of the rights and liberties of American citizenship. The right to punish for contempt is at best something of an arbitrary right, and in its exercise may be tyrannical.

In cases of indirect contempt the act or acts complained of take place outside of the presence of the court—it may be a hundred miles away. The judge has no personal knowledge of the conditions or facts. What harm can possibly result either to the citizen or to society by having a jury intervene in determining the questions of fact, and the actual guilt of the offender be established by a jury before he is deprived of his liberty.

This provision of the bill is in absolute accord with every spirit of Americanism and American institutions.

INJUNCTIONS.

Next, there is the provision with reference to issuing injunctions. The power to issue injunctions is a great one. It is far-reaching in its effect. The evidence unquestionably shows that it has frequently, in certain parts of the country, been abused. At times its abuse has verged upon scandal.

Under the provisions of this bill the injunctive power is simply limited in cases where experience has shown that it ought to be. Let us carefully examine the provisions of the bill in this regard and see just what they are.

First, the bill provides that no preliminary injunction shall be issued without notice to the opposite party. Is not this a reasonable and just provision?

Next, that no temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice to the opposite party, unless it shall clearly appear from specific facts shown by affidavit or by the verified bill that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to the property or property right of the applicant before notice could be served or hearing had thereon. Surely no reasonable or fair-minded man can object to this provision of the bill.

Next, except as provided in section 14, no restraining or interlocutory order of injunction shall issue, except upon the giving of security by the applicant in such sum as the court or judge may deem proper, conditioned upon the payment of such costs and damages as may be incurred or suffered by any party who may be found to have been wrongfully enjoined or restrained thereby. The requiring of security under such conditions for the payment of costs and damages is one of the ordinary courses of procedure, and is in every way in accord with American ideas of justice and legal procedure.

Next, that every order of injunction or restraining order shall set forth the reasons for the issuance of the same, and shall be specific in terms; shall describe in reasonable detail the act or acts sought to be restrained; and shall be binding only upon the parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, or those in active concert with them, and who shall by personal service or otherwise receive actual notice of the same.

What is there wrong, unfair, or unjust about this provision? Certainly orders of injunction should give the reasons for the issuance thereof, and should be specific in terms, so that the defendant may know exactly what he has to meet. This is in absolute accordance with legal principles and procedure. That the order should be binding only upon the parties to the suit, their agents, servants, employees, attorneys, and those in active concert with them, and who have received actual notice, is a most reasonable and just provision. To include in a blanket injunction other persons outside of the parties to the suit who have had no notice of the same or knowledge thereof is a most unjust proceeding, absolutely antagonistic to ordinary legal procedure, and almost certain to work great wrong and damage to absolutely innocent parties who have no connection with the matter in dispute.

It further provides that the Federal courts are prohibited from issuing injunctions against persons because of their ceasing to perform labor. It would seem almost unthinkable that under the power to issue injunctions Federal courts under this process would undertake to prevent a person from ceasing labor at his will. Yet it has been done, but can never be repeated if this bill passes.

It further prevents issuing injunctions to restrain laborers from recommending, advising, or persuading others to cease labor. Why should not laborers be unmolested in their right to advise with one another and to persuade one another when it is all done in a perfectly peaceful manner?

It further forbids the issuing of injunctions enjoining laboring men from attending meetings at or near places where persons reside or work or carry on business or happen to be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information or peacefully persuading persons to work or to abstain from work.

Why should laboring men in cases of disputes between employer and employees be restrained by injunction from conferring together, advising with one another, informing and peacefully persuading their associates in regard to matters of vital importance to them? Do not employers of labor under such conditions and during such disputes meet together at their houses, offices, and places of business for the purpose of conferring together and communicating information to one another and reasoning with their associate employers, and even with employers who are not associated with them, and persuading them to join with them as employers of labor during the pendency of strikes or labor disputes? Why should laborers be denied the same rights under such conditions that are freely accorded to and exercised by employers?

The bill further forbids the issuance of injunctions restraining paying, or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such disputes, any strike benefits, money, or things of value.

Again, I say, it would seem unthinkable to a free-born American citizen that when laboring people contribute together sums of money to be used for mutual benefit purposes in case of a labor dispute or strike, that the court should have the power by injunction process to prevent those laborers from distributing these benefits among their needy associates, who perhaps have been brought to actual want by the tyranny and injustice of their employers.

It further prevents the issuance of injunctions against any persons assembling at any place in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes.

The right to peacefully assemble in lawful manner and for lawful purposes was thundered from the cradle of liberty, old Fanuel Hall, in Boston, and was sealed by the blood of Revolutionary patriots. Their sculptured forms would move in shame from their pedestals if that right was to be denied by their descendants.

These are the provisions of the bill with respect to injunctions. They simply place the laboring man upon the same equality with every other citizen so long as he obeys the law.

It is simply an application of the old and sacred Democratic doctrine of equal rights to all. This is the bedrock of Democratic principles. The Democratic Party is the party of equal rights. It is not a rich man's party nor a poor man's party, not the party of big business or of little business, not the party of capital or of labor, not the party of employer or employee, but the party of the whole people pledged by its history, its traditions, and its eminent statesmen, living and dead, to the everlasting observation of the great principles of equal rights. To promote the "general welfare" was one of the first reasons set forth in the preamble to the Constitution. Mark you, the "general welfare" and not the special interests, or welfare of the favored or privileged few. In the mad race for wealth the general welfare has been fogotten, not only in business but in legislation. The Democratic Party intends to remove the dollar mark from legislation in this country and place in its stead the symbol of manhood. The days of privilege and plunder have gone, let us hope forever.

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

It is no exaggeration to say that the pending bills have to do with the most important economic and industrial problems in the history of the country. The questions involved not only essentially affect the business interests of the country, big and little, but vitally reach the welfare, comfort, and happiness of every man and family in the land. Aye, more, they reach the very groundwork of American free institutions and affect the stability of our governmental system as established by the fathers of this Republic.

In passing this antitrust legislation the Democratic Party is keeping absolutely good faith with the people. The Republican Party having utterly failed in the discharge of its mission, so far as antitrust legislation is concerned, the people of the country have turned to the Democratic Party for relief. If you pass these antitrust bills now before the House you will do much to inspire the people with confidence and hope in the assurance that "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people" is still with us. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota to use some of his time now.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. May I ask the gentleman whether he intends to conclude in one speech?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. We propose to conclude in one speech.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. METZ].

Mr. METZ. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the committee to make a speech, but only to point out some of the special features of the bill that appeal to me and to reply to a question asked while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] was speaking. I was asked why it was that a great many of the textile and other mills were running without profit or at a loss while apparently being busy. I want to answer that question to begin with. Those of you who know how business is done in the textile industry, and, for that matter, in other industries also, will realize that when a mill starts on a season's goods—and everything depends upon seasons with us—they, or their selling agents, send out their salesmen or their stocks are open to buyers who come to look at them, either way, and the mill's production is sold up for that season as quickly as possible, and that means that they can lay out their plans and run their looms on certain patterns, finish them up, and can then start new ones, and arrange to run for the season, according to the capacity of the mill, and the business for that season is arranged and the goods made up and shipped. To-day, and it has been so since the agitation of the tariff question began—and I want to say that the tariff is fair, and I think that it is the first scientific one we have had, and that it will work out all right if left alone and we are not bothered with other conditions; I am not afraid of the tariff even in the textile industry—but to-day no mill can sell and no buyer is buying ahead, and I refer to the big dry-goods stores, the department stores, and other large buyers. Salesmen in certain lines go out in two seasons—in May and June and November and December—and usually sell out the entire capacity of the mill for the season's output in those months. For the last year or so they have not sold their capacity in that time. The salesmen come home having sold, say, only one-third their quota.

The mill, therefore, only buys raw material in small lots, and pays more money, but the mill is running and labor is working, because they are making some goods, and during the balance of the season their orders may have come in just the same, so the total volume of business may not have decreased and we are not coming to a panic or failures; but the mill has been running in such an uncertain way because you could not foresee what was coming. Take, for instance, in the carpet business alone. A carpet is the last thing that a man is going to buy. He will put it off another year if he needs something else more and money is scarce. But even the carpet mills have run to full capacity, even if they had to run on dribs and drabs, by putting a pattern on the loom and then taking it off, and putting another pattern on and taking that off, and then changing back again, instead of running each one out. That means that the overhead expense has gone ahead and increased and that the mill has not made or has even lost money, while the help has been on the job right along, however, getting full pay, and have not suffered, and the fact that they have not suffered is the reason that makes business as good as it is to-day. The manufacturer, the stockholder, and the owner are the men who have suffered. The manufacturer does not dare go ahead, because he does not know when we are going to stop interfering or whether we are going to keep on interfering with him. That is the real situation in the manufacturing industries. I said that the stockholders in many mills have not received a dollar's worth of dividends in years, while the help has been working. The mill did not dare to shut down. In a small mill town you and I know what stopping means. The mill town is entirely helpless without the mill. It depends on the mill running. If it shuts down or there is a fire, the next day the mill help are scattered all over the country, and it is a hard thing to get back an organization. The manufacturer keeps on running to hold his organization and his market. The pay of the help has not been cut down; it has gone up. Rents have not gone up in those mill towns to any extent, and there have been no big revenues from the tenements to the owners. The help has gone on working, but the stockholders have not had any dividends, and I think the income tax is a good thing, if it simply shows these very people what they have not been making for some time past.

My friend from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] talks about the cotton mills in the South. Mr. Chairman, I have seen more mill men from the South in the last four weeks who are engaged in the cotton-manufacturing business than he has in a year. They were up in New York at the cotton manufacturers' convention. They are not crowing about prosperity. They are in the same condition as manufacturers in other sections, even if they are Democrats; and they admit they have got to be Democrats in the South; but business men and manufacturers have not got to be Democrats in the North, and they are not going to be if you do not let them alone. The gentleman's statements about the cotton mills in the South are not based on facts. I know that. I am in close business touch with them, and the gentleman is not. So much for conditions and the reasons therefor.

As to the provisions of the bill, I first want to refer to section 2, in respect to discrimination. The bill says you have to show intent to injure or destroy a competitor. It may be true that that may eventually be held to be the case, but suppose I am doing business with A and B in the same town. A is a big buyer, has experts employed, and he sends his buyer to New York and will not have me come near his plant at all. I am speaking now of consumers of mill supplies. B has a small plant, and he has not any expert chemist or expert of any kind, and I have to show him what to do. I have to send a trained man into his shop and show him how to use a product. It costs me more to sell to B than it does to sell to A.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. METZ. I thank the gentleman. The result is that though A comes to my place and makes his own terms, because he is better posted on competing products, and I have got to meet them, no matter how close my margin, or lose the order, under this section I have got to sell B at the same price as A, because the law says that I must not discriminate in price for same commodity. I am not injuring B's business, mind you, when I sell cheaper to A, but B finds out that I sell to A at a certain price, and then he refuses to pay his bills and sets up a defense that I have injured him by charging a higher price. I have got to go to court and defend his action, because he has not paid my bill. That is where you will hurt small business, because some large trusts may have held out on somebody else by refusing to sell or underselling to some one else for specific reasons of their own.

Section 4 refers to sale agents. The big concerns are the only ones who can afford to maintain agencies in every town and city. In many lines it is absolutely impossible. Take the machinery business. Nearly every machinery manufacturer does business in this way: He will appoint an agent for his machine, and that agent must bind himself to sell nothing in competition with that particular machine. There is not business enough to warrant his selling no other line of machines or similar products, so he makes similar contracts for exclusive sales of various kinds of machines, but only one of each type, and none competing with any of the others he carries. He sells products of various makers and he sells other machines, but he should not sell any competing with the manufacturer who supplies him with catalogues, supplies him with information, supplies him with facts, without which he would lack the experience to sell that or any other machine, and in supplying this the manufacturer uses the local exclusive agent instead of his own salesman, whom it would not pay to send out. This covers many other lines besides machinery, and if you wipe out the exclusive contracts and selling agencies you wipe out the business of a large percentage of the manufacturers in this country by checking their distribution, and that injures the working people and consumers of this country instead of helping them as you intend.

Mr. MADDEN. Seventy-five per cent?

Mr. METZ. Yes; 90 per cent; and you might say all, practically. The propositions are ridiculous. They are not fair, they are not right, and that is why the business and manufacturing interests of the country are praying and hoping that we will adjourn, go home, and let them alone. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Does the gentleman yield back his time?

Mr. METZ. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. WEBB. I will state to the gentleman from Minnesota that we have only one speaker on our side, and I will ask the gentleman to use what time he cares to consume before the concluding speech is made.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] pursued a rather peculiar course in his speech in the numerous challenges which he submitted for answer to his supposed invulnerable argument as to prices and their causes, in order to convince this House that the change of administration and its resultant legislation had been beneficial to the farmer. He submitted a set of figures as to prices for 1913 and also for corresponding dates in 1914. I submit that it is not a fair basis of comparison A fairer basis of comparison is where we have a set of figures based upon a time and a set of circumstances when the people of this country did not know that the blight of Democracy was to fall upon it. That was in May of that period in 1912, two years ago instead of one. One year ago the present administration was in power. One year ago the tariff policy of this country had been announced and a change determined upon.

The Underwood tariff bill, prior to the date given by the gentleman from Illinois, had passed this House. We knew what it was, and the business men of the country could readily predict and reason what it would do. It was the express purpose of the Underwood bill to lower the price of farm products and incidentally to injure the producers, and if this was not accomplished then it would be a confession of failure in its purpose.

Now, then, I shall submit for the RECORD a list of prices taken from a paper which did not oppose the present tariff law. I will read some of these figures and submit the rest in the RECORD under the rule. Wheat, average price in 1912 on May 1, was $1.22; in 1914 it was $1.03½. If the gentleman's rule is to be applied it would indicate a loss of 18½ cents in the period influenced by the present administration, because it was not long after the 1st of May, 1912, when it became apparent to the people of this country that there was to be a change of policy in this country, and the legislation which we have was clearly foreshadowed in the tariff legislation of the Sixty-second Congress. Corn in 1914 was 75 cents; in 1912 it was 86½ cents, a difference of 11½ cents. Oats in 1912 were 63 cents, and in 1914; 43½ cents. Flour in 1914 was $4.25, and in 1912, $5.10.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up the time of this committee. I had not expected to discuss this question, but when any gentleman coming from an agricultural State, like the State of Illinois, pretends to tell the farmers of this country that following or caused by the tariff legislation of this administration there has been improvement in any respect in price in the products of the farm, he merits contradiction. A careful figuring and investigation of the subject must convince him, as it has already convinced 30,000,000 people of the United States interested in farming, that the tariff legislation of this administration is directed against their interests and they are feeling its effect every time they go to market. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The figures are as follows:

	May 1, 1914.	May 1, 1912.	Change.
Wheat, bushel	$1.03½	$1.22	$0.18½

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to have anything to say on this bill, but it seems to me perhaps there are one or two facts that ought to be set forth in some form. One is that anyone who has studied the events that led up to the passage of the act of July 2, 1890, the Sherman antitrust law, knows that the agitation which led to that legislation was not started in the interest of consumers, it was not started by consumers, and the antitrust agitation never has been in the interest of consumers, nor have the laws worked in the interest of consumers. The consumers have always been the goats, and in this bill they are made more than ever the goats.

This bill will create a lot of contention. It is a bill—omitting the part cut out by the committee in writing one amendment—of some 21 pages. The Sherman law is only about 2 pages—a very short act. It has taken some 24 years even to construe with something approaching definiteness what it means. How long will it take to find out what this bill means? It is unwise to pass it, because of the uncertainty it will create and because it is bound to cause disappointment among the people, since it will not do what the people expect. They expect it to lower prices, and it is not going to lower prices. In some respects it is distinctly against lower prices for the people.

In one of its sections—section 2—this bill is exactly and diametrically opposite to the purposes of a bill we have passed in this House at this session. We passed a bill not long ago known as the river and harbor bill, for the express purpose, in large part, of making the railroads discriminate in prices between localities. Section 2 of this bill apparently applies to railroads.

Yet gentlemen on that side of the House who have spoken in favor of this bill, and also in favor of the river and harbor bill, said that the reason for improving certain rivers was to make the railroads come down in their rates in certain neighborhoods. The majority report on this bill says:

> Every concern that engages in this evil practice must of necessity recoup its losses in the particular communities or sections where their commodities are sold below cost or without a fair profit by raising the price of this same class of commodities above their fair market value in other sections or communities.

Now, if that is true, it must be true, also, of the railroads. If they have to lower their prices to meet water competition in places where we have provided the water competition, at public expense, they must recoup their losses by making them up in other localities.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PLATT. I will; with pleasure.

Mr. HULINGS. This bill permits discriminations to be made on account of the quantity of goods sold?

Mr. PLATT. It does.

Mr. HULINGS. Do you believe that is right and proper?

Mr. PLATT. I do not see why that is not right and proper. What you mean to say is that wholesale prices may be lower than retail prices?

Mr. HULINGS. It does not say wholesale or retail, but it says that on account of quantity discrimination can be made. Is that right?

Mr. PLATT. It is in accordance with the universal trade practice, and I would not want to say that it is wrong.

Mr. HULINGS. Now, if that kind of discrimination is permitted, do you not simply permit the big concern to grow great by what it feeds upon, because continually it would be handling larger and larger quantities?

Mr. PLATT. I think that is to some extent true.

Mr. HULINGS. Now, do you think the bill provides any remedy or prohibition of that sort of thing, and, if it does not, do you not think it should?

Mr. PLATT. Well, I doubt whether it should. I do not think it does. It leaves undone several things which might well be done and tries to do several things which should not be done. I think the chief thing the bill does is to raise a whole lot of new trouble and uncertainty, which will have to be settled by the courts in the end, and which, it seems to me, are unwise and unnecessary. As I have said, the bill is not in the interests of the consumers, and I can not see what its supporters expect it to accomplish of real value.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. MOORE. If this new antitrust law goes into effect, will it not give employment to a great many more lawyers?

Mr. PLATT. I think that perhaps is one of the purposes of it.

Mr. MOORE. And that is a very important matter so far as consumption is concerned?

Mr. PLATT. So far as the lawyers are consumers, do you mean?

Mr. MOORE. Yes. It will create business for antagonists at law?

Mr. PLATT. I am strongly of the opinion that it will.

Mr. MOORE. And for almost an indefinite period; that is, a man who goes into business with a capital of $50,000 will have to take a lawyer in with him whom he will have to keep for 20 years until the courts decide the case.

Mr. PLATT. I think perhaps that will be true. If it takes 20 years to find out what a 2-page law means, how long will it take to find out what a 20-page law means?

Mr. MOORE. Well, it means employment for somebody, anyhow?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I admit that much cheerfully; but it does not mean benefit to the general public.

THE RURAL-CREDIT BILL.

Now, I want to speak on another and an entirely different subject. Throughout the whole of the past winter and spring a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency has been preparing a farm-credit bill. Although the country has been promised such legislation, that bill, as has been publicly announced in the House, has been sidetracked because of a difference between the committee and the President of the United States, who desires to have certain features of the bill eliminated. Now, I hold no brief for President Wilson. I am a Republican and I have voted against the President's recommendations whenever I could with reason, but in this case, Mr. Chairman, the President is clearly right, and I can not understand why Democrats want to disagree with their President and leader when he is right, why they want to postpone legislation that ought to be passed simply because they will not make it as sound as he wants to make it.

The farm-credit bill contains a section which provides that bonds shall be issued on the security of farm mortgages, certified from local associations, by what are called land banks, one in each of the Federal reserve districts, and it provides that not to exceed $50,000,000 worth of those bonds may be purchased by the United States Government every year. The President objects to that, and very properly. It is unnecessary and unwise. It implies that our American agricultural population is on a par with Russian peasantry, recently emancipated from serfdom. Our farmers would or should resent such an implication. Without this Governments' aid we have produced a good bill, a bill which will not work miracles, but will give the farmers a certain chance which they have not now got for obtaining credit, and will give considerable relief, especially in sections where interest rates are highest. The greatest trouble with some politicians is that they want to perform miracles. They tell the people that they are going to do something that is to make them all rich. That is impossible. It is possible, however, to create an institution that will have a healthy growth and will do a great deal of good, and that, I believe is what we have done. I can not see why the wishes of the Secretary of Agriculture, who is one of the best men in the President's Cabinet, and why the wishes of the President himself in this case should not prevail with the Committee on Banking and Currency and with the Congress. Men who have studied the subject of farm credits more than anyone else, such men as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Moss], agree absolutely with the President, and I hope that the Democratic Party, however much it may want to split apart on other matters, will conclude in this case to amend that bill as he desires, and that we may pass it at this session.

I yield back the balance of my time.

[Mr. CALDER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, in closing the general debate for the minority, while I shall criticize the provisions of this bill, I shall at the same time sound a note of progress.

I believe that any Member of the minority, for a number of good and sufficient reasons, might vote against this bill. Certainly there are good reasons why any minority member of the Judiciary Committee or any Republican might vote against this bill. I have been asked whether I will vote for the bill. I have said that it was my intention to do so; not that I think many of the provisions are wise or will be beneficial or helpful to the country, but because in a way I believe the bill represents progress.

The Republican Party for nearly a quarter of a century in its platforms has declared that the Sherman antitrust law should be supplemented by other legislation. The Republican Party has at almost every national convention declared in favor of further regulation of the large industrial concerns, and in favor of a stricter control of their practices and business methods. My conception is that the Republican Party is not only not opposed to so-called antitrust legislation, but is positively in favor of such legislation. And I feel sure, Mr. Chairman, that if the majority party in this House that had control of this bill, that molded it and fashioned it and brought it into this House in its present shape, had presented a bill that really met the situation, that presented a wise, positive, constructive policy for the proper regulation and control of the great industrial corporations, the Republicans, as well as the Progressives, would have lined up solidly for the bill. But unless the bill shall be materially amended, certainly a Republican may vote against it consistently and perhaps wisely.

Mr. Chairman, I think that in all antitrust legislation we should follow a few general rules and principles. We should have these in mind in preparing the various provisions and sections of the bill: First, we should have in mind the fact that the one thing we wish to destroy is monopoly; the one thing that we wish to properly control and regulate and bring under proper subjection is the great industrial corporation that really has power—the power to arbitrarily control prices and thus exact unjust profits from the people.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to know whether, in the gentleman's opinion, this bill does destroy monopoly or affects it injuriously in any way—that is, in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. In my opinion it does not, and that is what I propose to show. Second, we should have in mind this important fact, that the one thing we wish to maintain, and retain and sustain, is competition. We want to destroy monopoly and restore and maintain competition.

Third, in preparing this legislation, we should make the provisions in the bill comprehensive in the number of abuses which they prohibit, but restrict and narrow its scope in so far as the actual number of business concerns brought under its control. That is to say, we should not interfere with private business any more than is necessary for the protection of the public interests; and the Federal Government should not interfere with the control of private business within the States any more than is necessary to protect the public interests from a national viewpoint.

Small concerns, so far as is compatible with national interests, should be left to the control of the States. Through Federal laws we should seek to control only corporations which have such capital, such wealth, such business organizations, such control over natural resources that make their regulation and control necessary for the protection of the people of the entire Nation. We are entering a new field of legislation. We went along for a hundred years before we enacted the Sherman law. That was the first attempt of the National Government to control what we usually term private business. The pure-food law may be regarded another instance. That was to protect the health of the people of the Nation. Excepting the Sherman law and the pure-food law, the National Government has gone 125 years without controlling private business. Shall the Federal Government now, in one act, assume control of every business concern in the Nation? Certainly not. The National Government has a plenty to do, has a sufficient problem to solve, if it will give its entire attention and all its great power to properly solving the problems that grow out of big business. The smaller concerns may be taken care of later. Let us first control the big concerns before we waste our thought and energy upon the ninety and nine that have not gone astray and need no control. Section 2 of the bill brings within its provisions not only all corporations, but it brings all persons and individuals engaged in interstate business.

To illustrate, the second congressional district of Oklahoma, in which I live, is situated along the northern part of the State. It extends for a distance of 400 miles along the Kansas border. There are four or five railroads crossing the Kansas line from my district. There are small cities all through that section of the country. Those people do more or less interstate business. There are no great monopolies there, yet under this bill every corporation, every concern, every person that does business across that line will come under section 2 of this act, and the prices at which they dispose of their products will be under the provision of the National Government. If a farmer takes eggs and butter and garden products across the line to a neighboring city and for some reason wants to cut the price thereon in order to get rid of his goods, he will be liable to be investigated by the Federal Government.

Section 2 is not comprehensive in the number of unfair discriminations which it prohibits, because it prohibits only one thing. It prohibits only discrimination in price, with the intent to destroy or wrongfully injure a competitor. That is very narrow. I would broaden the language by making it include all discrimination by saying "to discriminate in price, terms, or otherwise." Then, under section 2 of this act, no discrimination is unlawful unless done with the intent "to destroy or wrongfully injure a competitor." Why should not we prohibit discrimination done with the intent to establish a monopoly or to destroy or lessen competition?

Remember, it is monopoly that we want to destroy. Remember, it is competition we wish to maintain. Then, why did you make it an offense to discriminate in price with the intention of injuring a competitor, and leave it so that a man may have as his object in discrimination the establishment of a monopoly or the destruction of competition and be free from prohibitions of the law? To make this section broader and more comprehensive I suggest the following substitute:

SEC. 2. That any person engaged in commerce who shall discriminate in price, terms, or otherwise, as between persons, sections, or communities, with intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure a competitor or to establish a monopoly or to destroy or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, distribution, or sale of any such article, product, or commodity, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The large monopoly that we are trying to hit by this bill might be affected. What about the hundred small industries in the same business, like the shoe business, for example? What effect will this provision have upon them?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. The effect upon them will be to annoy them, to restrict and limit their business, and in that way injure, retard, and restrict trade, commerce, and industry. We ought to leave business free, so far as we can, so long as it is unnecessary to restrict it in the interest of the public.

Now, I think the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] read a list of States that he said had statutes practically similar to the provisions of section 2 of this act. There are a number of States—15 or 18 of them—that have a somewhat similar statute. Apparently they have been copied one from another. Well, it does not follow that the problem we have to solve is the same problem that the States have to solve, and the mere fact that some of the States have similar statutes does not necessarily mean that we should copy those statutes into our national law.

I have here copies of 14 of those State statutes. Here is New Jersey, which has a similar statute. The laws of New Jersey ought to have weight with the other side of the House. The New Jersey statute makes it a crime to discriminate in price, not for the purpose or intent of injuring a competitor, but makes it a crime to discriminate in price "if the effect or intent thereof is to establish and maintain a virtual monopoly, hinder competition, or restrict trade."

That is the language of the New Jersey statute. The California statute makes discrimination in price a crime, if it is done "with the intent to destroy the competition of any regularly established dealer in such commodity, product, or service, or prevent competition." The language used in these various State statutes is as follows:

ARKANSAS—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

With the intent and purpose of driving out competition or for the purpose of financially injuring competitors.

CALIFORNIA—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

With the intent to destroy the competition of any regularly established dealer in such commodity, product, or service, or to prevent the competition of any person, firm, private corporation, or municipal or other public corporation.

LOUISIANA—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

Intentionally for the purpose of injuring or destroying the business of a competitor in any locality.

NEBRASKA—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

Intentionally for the purpose of destroying the business of a competitor in any locality.

NEW JERSEY—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

If the effect or intent thereof is to establish or maintain a virtual monopoly, hindering competition, or restricting trade.

NORTH DAKOTA—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

Intentially for the purpose of destroying or preventing competition.

OKLAHOMA—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

Intentionally for the purpose of destroying the competition of any regularly established dealer in such commodity or to prevent the competition of any person who in good faith intends and attempts to become such dealer.

SOUTH DAKOTA—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

With intent and for the purpose of destroying competition by any regular established dealer in any such commodity or product.

UTAH—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

Intentionally for the purpose of destroying the competition of any regular established dealer in such commodity or to prevent the competition of any person who in good faith intends and attempts to become such dealer.

WISCONSIN—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

Intentionally for the purpose of destroying the competition of any regular established dealer in such commodity or to prevent competition of any person who in good faith intends or attempts to become such dealer.

IDAHO—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

For the purpose of driving out of business any other person engaged therein.

MICHIGAN (APPLIES ONLY TO PETROLEUM PRODUCTS)—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

Intentionally for the purpose of destroying the business of a competitor.

MISSOURI—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

Intentionally for the purpose of destroying the competitor of any regular established dealer.

NORTH CAROLINA—DISCRIMINATION IN PRICE.

To willfully injure or destroy or undertake to injure or destroy the business of any rival or opponent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, out of all these 14 statutes which I have collected there is not one that exactly agrees with this bill, but the Nebraska and the Louisiana statutes use practically the same language used in this bill. Most of these State statutes make discriminations in price unlawful when done to establish monopoly or to destroy competition; and if we are to use the State statutes, we should follow the majority, unless there is some good reason why we should not do so.

It has been said here in this general debate that the minority Members criticize, but do not make any suggestions. But I shall do more than criticize. I shall present substitutes for the provisions which you have in this bill for a number of sections, as I have already presented a substitute for section 2.

In this bill there are but three or four things prohibited. First, it prohibits discrimination in price; second, it prohibits mine owners from arbitrarily refusing to sell the products of the mine; third, it prohibits a dealer from making any contract so as to prevent a purchaser from dealing in the goods, wares, and merchandise of others; fourth, it prohibits in a way holding companies; fifth, it prevents to a certain extent interlocking directors. Those are the only things prohibited. Do you believe that these include all the unfair practices? Do you believe that the enactment of this law prohibiting these four or five things will destroy a single trust, will obliterate a single monopoly, will bring any great business concern under the control of the Government or into effective competition so that it will not have arbitrary power to control the prices of its products? Certainly you do not.

Here is what I would suggest as a substitute for section 3:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for the owner or operator of any mine or for any person controlling the sale or distribution of the product of any mine engaged in commerce to discriminate in the sale or distribution of such product as between persons, corporations, or communities in the matter of price, terms, or otherwise, so as to give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, firm, corporation, or community in any respect whatsoever, or so as to subject any particular person, firm, corporation, or community to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever, and any person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

There is a provision that would make that section workable. It would be fair, because it would only prohibit those acts of a mine owner which will enable him to give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any person, or to cause undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage to any person or corporation.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman is a member of the committee and has given a great deal of study to this question. Can the gentleman say what the word "mine" means in section 3?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No; I can not.

Mr. PLATT. Is a stone quarry or a sand bank a mine? I think the statistics of mining includes quarries.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I went to the dictionary to reach a conclusion for myself, but I think the matter as it stands here will be of doubtful meaning.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. What was the particular purpose in drafting this bill that special attention was given to mines rather than to other industries; for instance, forestry or other products of the soil?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I do not think any Member can explain it, and I do not think that any gentleman on the floor in debate has explained the purpose of simply placing the mine owners under that provision.

Mr. SLOAN. Is there any explanation known to any member of the committee?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Not to me; and I can not answer as to the others.

Now, I believe I have prepared a section which will include all that is in sections 2, 3, and 4; absolutely includes every unfair practice or discrimination in those three sections and many others, too. I will read it:

SEC. —. That any person engaged in commerce who shall by the price or charge for any article, product, or commodity sold or leased, or by the terms granted or given to the purchaser or lessor of any article, product, or commodity, or by the contract, arrangement, or condition upon which any such article, product, or commodity shall be sold or leased, or by any other means discriminate as between persons, localities, or communities so as to give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, firm, corporation, locality, or community in any respect whatsoever, or so as to subject any particular person, firm, corporation, community, or locality to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both.

When the Federal Government enacted the act known as the interstate-commerce act, February 4, 1887, it placed in it a section which was intended to include all unfair practices by railway companies or common carriers. I have adopted the language largely used in the above draft, and the provision in the interstate-commerce act was taken from the English traffic act enacted in 1854.

I think, gentlemen, that in our enactment for the control of great industrial corporations and in providing our procedure we ought to follow as near as we can, so far as applicable, the legislation to control common carriers and public-utility companies. There are many reasons for that. In the first place, large business concerns in the greater part are similar to transportation companies, not only in the extent of business but in the effect upon the public in those practices that injure the general public or injure localities or injure individuals. Then we have a precedent to follow. Now, the language used in this amendment which I would suggest has been construed over and over again by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it has been construed time and again by the Supreme Court of the United States.

There is much in the suggestion by my colleague from Pennsylvania that when we multiply our statutes here we introduce uncertainties, because every statute has to be construed and will be construed, and it will take years and years to determine just what a statute means. So that it is wisdom on our part to follow the language so far as we can of statutes which have been construed, and the meaning of which has been determined time and time again. Here you are introducing a large number of new statutory provisions to be construed by the courts, and as the Sherman law was written, it took the courts of our land 25 years for us to get any real conception of what it meant. So there would be wisdom in drafting a statute that is to cover unfair practices, that is to cover unfair discriminations, because that is what it means, by taking language that has been already construed. If a man varies his prices to injure another, that is unfair discrimination. If he establishes a monopoly by making the purchaser agree not to deal in goods of other dealers, that is an unfair practice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. So here in this amendment I have placed it in the language of the interstate-commerce act that has been construed. If we adopt that, we would have some conception of what it meant, business interests would have some conception of what it meant, and it would not injure any business by new provisions which you have introduced.

Now, my greatest objection to this bill, so far as it represents proposed antitrust legislation, is that under it we will get no results.

If the real purpose and aim is to control the great business concerns, then we ought to provide some practical way, and I have prepared here a section, which I hope to offer as a new section, which I think would provide a practical way of actually controlling big corporations with power to dictate prices. It is as follows:

That whenever any United States attorney shall have reliable information that any corporation engaged in commerce in the manufacture, sale, or distribution of any necessity of life, or of any article, product, or commodity in common use, by reason of the nature, character, or extent of its business, the absence of effective competition, or for any other cause, possesses the power to control arbitrarily the price or prices of any necessity of life, or of any article, product, or commodity in common use, it shall be the duty of said United States attorney, under the direction of the Attorney General, to file a petition in the United States court against said corporation, alleging the aforesaid facts and praying that the said corporation shall be adjudged to be a quasi public corporation and subject to the control of the Commissioner of Corporations, or subject to the control of any commission that may at the passage of this act or thereafter be the successor of the Commissioner of Corporations, in all its practices, prices, and charges, in like manner and to the same extent that common carriers are now subject to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and if the court shall find that the material facts alleged in the petition are true, it shall render a decree adjudging the said corporation to be a quasi public corporation, subject in all its practices, prices, and charges to the control of the Commissioner of Corporations, or the commission, as the case may be, as prayed for in the petition: Provided, That thereafter the practices of said corporation in conducting its business and the prices at which it shall sell its products shall be just, fair, and reasonable.

I propose a practical method. Of course, if we are not in earnest in this matter, if we expect these large corporations that do have monopolistic power to go on and on indefinitely, without any real control, without any real regulation, then the provisions which you have here are well enough, but I say here, and I have become thoroughly convinced of that, that a few prohibitions making three or four things unlawful will absolutely not change the condition that we have before us. If there exists monopoly in this country, if we have corporations that have the power to control the prices of the necessities of life, or of commodities in common use among the people, while we are trying to destroy them, let us at least control them, so as to save the people from harm.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Did the gentleman submit his amendments to the committee on mediation with the administration in the construction of this bill, so that they had the benefit of his suggestions?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Not this particular one, but some of them I did, and they do not appear to be incorporated in the bill. As I say, I believe the Republican Party stands for additional legislation. I believe the Republican Party, if placed in power, would enact additional legislation. I believe there are great concerns in this country that should be brought under stricter regulation and control. There may be large concerns that can not be dissolved under the Sherman antitrust law. Take, for instance, the Standard Oil Co.

I listened to testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, telling how one of the companies into which the Standard Oil Co. had been dissolved had, down in my State, absolute control of a great business interest of that country in the production, distribution, and sale of oil, and yet no law on the statute books to control it—an institution that had been dissolved under the Sherman antitrust law! Yet that corporation is in absolute power to control the price of the product and the distribution and the sale. Is this thing to go on? Will we act like schoolboys at play, or will we prepare some measure that will be effective, that will secure results? I have sometimes criticized some of the provisions of the constitution of my own State, and yet to-day there is not a State in the Union that has better laws for controlling business concerns with monopolistic power than Oklahoma, and if the majority in this House will model the legislation on the legislation of that State it would give to the interstate trade commission such power as our corporation commission holds, such jurisdiction as our commission has, and enact such laws as I suggest; then it will be progress; but the legislation which you propose here will be disappointing to the people; it will not bring results, and, in my judgment, you will have made no real progress in settling the great industrial problems which confront us, and the people will be disappointed in your works and place the Government in the hands of those who will solve these great problems correctly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HOWARD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2860) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall need all of the five minutes. I simply want to call the attention of the committee to one of the objections which is being made to this legislation. I have two or three times called the attention of Members who were speaking in favor of this bill to what seems to be a serious objection in section 4. I have no doubt the framers of the bill intended this measure should operate in the interest of the public and in the interest of the small producer, but as I understand this section, as the small producers that have written me understand the section, it will militate very severely against their interest. My attention has been called to this fact, and I am presenting it in order that it may be explained, if it can be explained. They called my attention to the fact that under the present arrangement the only way in which they can secure opportunity to sell their goods in the great trade centers is by making exclusive sale agreements. For example, my attention is called to this matter by one of my constituents, a small independent concern that has been fighting the trust independently all of these years, and fighting it rather successfully. This small concern employs 40 or 50 men. It has only very limited capital.

The only way in which it is able to sell its products, which in this particular case consists of shapers and planers, is to go into the industrial centers and make a contract with some man that he shall have the exclusive agency of their products, and that in turn he shall agree not to sell the products of any competitor. Under that arrangement there is an encouragement to the dealer to push this particular brand of goods. If we enact this section 4 into law in its present form, what will be the result? There will be no incentive whatever to the dealer in the various industrial centers to push this or that particular kind of goods. In other words, it will not be possible for the little fellow to maintain his selling agency. If he can not do so, his market is taken from him, and he is compelled to suffer great financial loss, his mill will be closed for lack of market for his product, and the workmen who have heretofore been busy at work manufacturing this product will be thrown out of employment or compelled to suffer great reductions in wages. Now, that will not affect the trusts. The big concern can do, under the terms of this bill, as it is doing now. It can maintain its own selling agency, because it has the money with which to do it; but the small concern can not maintain the selling agency; and by taking away the right which it is now enjoying of making these contracts with dealers it does seem to me that the law will operate, certainly not as it was intended by the committee, but it will nevertheless operate, not in favor of the small dealer, not in favor of the public, but in the long run this section, I believe, will play into the hands of the big producer who now has a practical monopoly of the market. Now, it may be that there can be an answer to that objection.

I have listened to a number of speeches which have been made and I have asked a number of questions, but I have not heard any answer given to that objection, and I present the matter here now in order that any gentleman who may discuss the bill will give seme attention to this phase of the proposed legislation. We want legislation here that will operate in the interest of the public and will not operate to crush out of existence the small producer. So far as I am concerned, I believe in the principle of competition. I believe we ought to undertake here to legislate so as to encourage competition and to make it possible for the small producer to sell his wares in the markets. I am afraid if we pass this bill in its present form that we are so legislating, not purposely, I am sure, but we are nevertheless so legislating as to make it impossible for the small concern to carry on its business—the small concern employing 25, 30, 40, or 50 men, with a limited capital of $50,000, $80,000, or $100,000. I much fear this legislation, if enacted without amendment, would make it impossible for that sort of a concern to continue to do business, and therefore we would be playing unwittingly into the hands of the big corporations which have the wealth and the power to maintain their own selling agencies. I am sure gentlemen do not wish to do that. I shall ask consent to extend my remarks by printing one of the letters to which I have referred.

The letter is as follows:

KENTON, OHIO, May 15, 1914.

Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We call your attention as our Representative in Congress to section 3 of House bill 15657, amending the Sherman law so as to make the practice of exclusive selling agreements between the manufacturer and middleman a misdemeanor. This section as it stands is in the interest of large combines and monopolies. These large companies do not need the middleman the same as the smaller competitors, because they can afford to establish their own selling organizations in the various market centers; in fact, most of them have their own selling organizations, and this section, prohibiting exclusive selling agreements, takes away the only means by which smaller competitors of these big combines are able to compete with them in selling.

This company, the Ohio Machine Tool Co., manufactures planers and shapers, which are classed as machine tools. We can not afford in any sense of the word to have our own selling organization in each trade center, and there are not enough of our machines sold, even in the larger cities, to warrant having an office at these points. This company employs about 50 men, and we depend entirely upon our dealers absolutely to sell our product. We have one dealer in each industrial center, who represents us exclusively. In other words, he has agreed to sell no other planers or shapers manufactured by our competitors, and we have agreed not to sell through any of his competitors in the same territory; he, having the exclusive agency thus created, offers our machines whenever he receives an inquiry, and he knows that all the work he puts in in trying to make a sale will not be lost, because if his customer purchases one of our machines he will receive the commission.

Kindly appreciate the state of affairs that would exist if we were obliged to sell our machines through any dealer who wishes to make the sale. If one of our dealers had worked up the business by talking our tools for maybe a year or more, then another dealer would come in, and perhaps because he was the man on the ground at the time would obtain the order. That is not a fair proposition to any dealer, because all his work in advertising his product is lost when he lost his sale, and under these conditions we very shortly would have nobody pushing our tools, and this company would be obliged, in all probability, to shut down.

Our large competitors, who manufacture not only one or two different kinds of machine tools, but many different kinds, who happen to have their own offices in the different parts of the country, with their own salesmen, and by plugging uninterrupted on their own product, it wouldn't take long to drive the little fellow to the wall.

It seems to us that if our Congressmen have a clear idea of what this really means, that they will use their efforts to protect the smaller concerns, and hence our desire of writing you in detail. Under the present method of exclusive arrangement there is ample competition between the various dealers for the benefit of the customers; each dealer is fighting every other dealer in the interest of his exclusive line. If the exclusive agency agreement is abolished and the manufacturer must sell all dealers, who in turn must sell all competitive makes of the same article, then economic and efficient selling is destroyed and selling expenses greatly increased, due to the larger stocks, larger warehouses, and more salesmen required, it goes without saying that the increased expenses must ultimately be paid by the consumer.

We have explained the above matters to the foremen in our shop, advising them what this bill means to us and to other shops of similar character, with the idea of having them explain to the workmen what such a law would accomplish if passed by Congress.

We would be glad to receive a letter from you, stating that you will oppose this section of the bill.

Yours, very truly,

THE OHIO MACHINE TOOL CO.,
C. C. SWIFT, Secretary.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time which I have at my disposal—2 hours and 18 minutes—to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], a member of the committee, or so much of that time as he may care to use.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-two Members are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15657, and, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 219 Members responded to their names, and he presented therewith the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee having under consideration the bill H. R. 15657, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 219 Members—a quorum—responded to their names, and he reports the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal. The committee will resume its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 2 hours and 18 minutes.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, for nearly six months I have been intimately and closely associated with the bill which is now before this House for consideration and it is my purpose to-day to explain it in detail, from the standpoint of the majority membership; but before doing so I want to make reference to some irrelevant matter which has found its way into the RECORD. I say "irrelevant." Perhaps from a partisan political standpoint it may be considered, by those who gave utterance to the expressions to which I intend to refer, to be relevant, but I was surprised and almost astounded to hear the two gentlemen representing the minority, Mr. VOLSTEAD and Mr. NELSON, complain in this House, in the presence of the country, of secrecy and of partisanship in the preparation of this bill. Neither charge has any foundation in fact.

Never has legislation been proposed more in the open or considered more in the open, in every line and in every section, than the bill which is now before this House. This committee did an unusual and, so far as I know, unprecedented thing. Before entering into the consideration of this important subject it gave to this House and the country tentative bills, and when they were offered we invited the country to be heard upon the subject, giving them something about which to think and about which we might have earnest, honest, and intelligent discussion. The committee sat for over three months in hearing everyone who applied to be heard. Volumes of testimony have been taken. At every one of those hearings the minority Members were present and consumed, in my judgment, more time than the majority Members. It so happens that the record will bear me out in this statement. The first name which appears in the record is that of Mr. MORGAN, a minority member of the committee, and the very last name which appears in the record is that of the same gentleman. Mr. VOLSTEAD himself occupied, in my judgment, more time in interrogating witnesses than any other member of the committee. Mr. NELSON occupied as much time as he pleased, and was always present at the hearings. There was no partisanship that crept into this matter until the time arrived for a vote upon the bill, when the Republican minority absented itself from the committee, in my judgment and belief, for the purpose of breaking a quorum and to delay final consideration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the first act of partisanship that made its appearance in connection with these bills, until now, when we come to the House for consideration, then what do we find?

We find that the Republican Party, a once harmonious body for forceful, efficient work and service, and capable of honest thought, has divided itself into fragments by disputes among its leaders that are impossible of being reconciled. The only cry made upon which they do unite, the only thing upon which they seem to be united, is the cry of "do nothing." The party that once boasted of its power of constructing legislation, the party that once prided itself upon its performances, now only in chorus can unite in asking and recommending that nothing be done. The old Know Nothing Party seems to have given away had been supplanted by the "Do-Nothing" Party.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] injected himself into this debate and read quite a lengthy argument against the bill, upholding the contention, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has done, that the bills are too drastic. We find Mr. NELSON, who has given some consideration to the subject, stating with seeming seriousness to the country that the bills are worthless because they do not accomplish anything. And we find Mr. VOLSTEAD, the minority leader of the committee, telling the country that the only thing accomplished by the bill is practically to repeal the Sherman law, so far as holding companies are concerned. We have a unique enemy confronting us, going in three different directions. The speeches of Messrs. GRAHAM and MADDEN will be circulated in manufacturing sections of the country, thickly populated, with the intention of scaring business interests by telling them that we are destroying business; while the soft, milder, and sweeter tones of Brother NELSON'S speech will be circulated in the less thickly settled sections of the country, in the rural and agricultural districts, and will say to those people that we are doing nothing whatever. So their speeches have been carefully prepared to catch all sections of the country and all classes of the people in the next campaign, though upon conflicting statements. As delivered here in the House, from every viewpoint and every standpoint, as I said, they are irreconcilable, but, nevertheless, may make campaign material. But I want to point out, above all things, to the country that not a single member of the minority, not even Mr. MADDEN, the great statesman, who says that we are not engineers and we are not a great many things that we perhaps ought to be, has proposed a substitute bill. Not one man or a dozen men on that side of the House have taken the time or had the good conscience to tell the country in what respect and detail a better bill could be prepared and offered. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If this proposed legislation is wrong, why not point it out? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], a great lawyer and a good man, spent an hour this morning in railing against the Democratic Party and its attitude as reflected in this bill. He says that it ought to be amended. I ask him why he has never offered an amendment in committee to any section of the bill? If the bill needs amendment, why has he not pointed it out? [Applause on the Democratic side.] In his lengthy speech this morning he reminded me of a gentleman who sent his son out into the country some months ago to shoot a turkey. He said, "Son, when that turkey lights, you fire both barrels." The boy came back two hours afterwards without the turkey. The father said, "Why did you not kill that turkey?" The son replied, "Father, he never lit." And so with Mr. GRAHAM'S speech; he never "lit," and discussed but one section of the 23 sections that this bill contains. He has neither told the House nor the country wherein this bill is destructive [applause on the Democratic side]; and, what is more, he can not. He has used every adjective in the English language to denounce it, but has not, with all of his great ability, pointed out one single desirable amendment which this House ought to adopt. But in his report he places himself where the Republican Party has been for the last 24 years, squarely upon the Sherman law, and says that it is good enough, and that we should let it alone. He takes exactly the position that has been taken on the stump in the last five months by former Attorney General Wickersham, namely, that the Sherman law is a sacred instrument and we ought not to disturb it. We have in part followed that policy. We have adopted the policy not of disturbing it but supplementing it with such legislation as is within the common knowledge of all people necessary now for the protection of the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

They criticize the President of the United States for his course on this bill. My countrymen, I do not belong to the "cuckoo" class. I was not a Baltimore general or even one of the privates. I preferred either of the two associates of mine in this House for the Presidency, and, if I could have accomplished it, one or the other would have been nominated. But since he has come to be President I have come to know the man, and I want to say to my fellow Democrats in this House to-day that if we follow his leadership in the future as we have within the past 12 months we will remain in power for the next quarter of a century. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he resents Executive interference. Now, let me tell this House in frankness what Executive interference has consisted of in the preparation of this bill. First, the Executive came before the American Congress and surprised the country by his frankness in laying down a specific program. He said we should amend the antitrust laws, and he stated in what respects they should be amended. After that utterance your committee prepared the tentative bills. We discussed them with him, and I want to say that from that day to this, in the many conferences that it has been my privilege to enjoy with him, I never have observed a freer, franker, or more open mind than his has been in the discussion of this important matter. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And he has been not only willing and anxious to listen to gentlemen charged with the responsibility of the preparation of these bills, but has given us of his valuable time the greatest abundance. In spite of the fact that the country has been facing war with Mexico, with every kind of a public question that can be imposed on the human intellect bearing heavily upon his, there never has been a moment when he has not been willing to give counsel and advice to the gentlemen who have had charge of this bill. And when we came to bring it to the House in final shape, though it does reflect the best judgment of the committee and the judgment of the President, we have been willing to lay it before the Congress of the American people in order that in its last analysis it may reflect their judgment by amendment. Now it is thrown open for amendment in every direction. And I invite gentlemen on the other side of this House who rail against this bill to let the country know their views on trust legislation by offering them in the shape of amendment or another bill. But this will not be done. They will content themselves with finding fault with what the majority has done and think that they have escaped their responsibility to the country in crying against us. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have proven that we are not afraid of big business. We have, in the preparation of this bill, undertaken to say to the country that this is a big country and we want big business, but we want little business to have an opportunity to grow big. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen have railed on the other side, charging that we were injuring little business. My good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] was one of those who took that position. Everybody knows that from his very environment in that great manufacturing city of Philadelphia he is tender and solicitous about little business. O champions of little business on the other side of the House, are you afraid now to mention big business? Have you really got little business in your speeches while big business is in your mind? The truth is what this country wants; it is what this country is entitled to; and the Democratic Party speaks it as an encouragement to business, big and little alike. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There is not a line in this bill that has been drawn with any idea of injuring or destroying American enterprise or American capital. It has been drawn for the purpose of encouraging investment, encouraging intelligent action and opportunity, but with the old Democratic principle underlying it all—"Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It has been complained of here that we have done nothing to destroy the "rule of reason." My countrymen, let me express the hope that the time will never come in this country when any party that wants to destroy any rule of reason will be large enough to impress itself upon our people. There is in the minds of everyone a little lamp that illuminates and points the way to intelligent action. That lamp is reason, and when reason ceases, all rules must fall.

We have not changed the "rule of reason" because we found upon investigation of every decision of the Supreme Court that the men who railed against reason had lost their bearings in the forest and were groping in the dark; because that court, in applying the "rule of reason," has applied it in the interest of the people, and there has never been a combination sought to be dissolved up to this moment that has not been dissolved by the application of the "rule of reason." When you have an active force acting along that line in behalf of the people it would be a crime to destroy it.

The Sherman law is not a new statute. It has been on our books for 24 years, and the party that now says, "Let it alone" is somewhat consistent, because it let it strictly alone for 20 years. No effort was made to enforce it; no effort was made to bring under its provisions the men who had been monopolizing and restraining the commerce of our country. It was not until by the lash of public sentiment you were whipped into active prosecution of the law that the real force of it was known and felt.

I believe Mr. Roosevelt claims the credit for the Northern Securities case. He certainly claims the credit for every other thing. Since I have mentioned his name, permit me to say I have heard that the gentlemen whom he led out of the party a year or two ago are soon to be led back again. He has marched them up the hill, and he has marched them down again; and when they are up they are up, and when they are down they are down, but they are only happy when in the middle, neither up nor down. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman claims to inform the House. Who gave him that information? We Progressives have not heard of it.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, if I should undertake to tell this House the number of things the Progressives have never heard of, I would be here until doomsday. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BRYAN. When the gentleman attempts to tell that little story that he just told, he told something that the Progressives never will hear of, even if they live until doomsday. [Applause.]

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am not finding fault with the Progressives. You Progressives have done us a great service. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] You have done the country a great service, because I believe you have done as much to bring the Democratic Party into power as our own good works have done, and I hope you will continue to do so, though I am inclined to think you are getting ready to break back into the old fold——

Mr. BRYAN. You are wrong——

Mr. CARLIN. Provided they will let you break. But if they think of you next year as they thought of you last year, there will be trouble in that household when you get back into it again.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to the bill itself. There is more, thank God, in our country than politics. Patriotism still lives in our land, and when we come now facing, as we do, the relationship of the Federal Government to industrial corporations and combinations which touch the very life blood, the arteries of life itself, we ought to be able to deal with these questions from a patriotic standpoint, at least from an economical standpoint.

Now, when we come to examine the political economies of the situation, what do we find? We find there are two schools of thought in the country, one school advocating the regulation and control of industrial combinations, the school to which I belong advocating dissolution of industrial combinations in order and to the end that the natural laws of competition may control in trade. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Upon one side much has been said in favor of regulation and control. They desire the same rule applied to industrial combinations that the country has applied to common carriers—regulation and control. But I think it is a dangerous school of thought, because in the last analysis it means Government monopoly or Government-sanctioned monopoly.

When we come to price fixing through a commission, or regulating by commission private trading between man and man, you have stepped into a socialistic atmosphere that has no place under the Stars and Stripes. Individuals will find themselves—the small business man, the business man that seems now to be the special care of my Republican friends, the little fellows—will find themselves in this shape: The Government could and would fix the price of the commodities produced by large manufacturers, the price of their articles, upon the basis of a reasonable profit. What little man can live in business upon the basis of an interest-bearing percentage profit? And as a consequence when the Government had once fixed the reasonable price at which those articles should be sold, the little fellow would disappear from business, and the big one alone could live. But, oh, what a short life his would be!

It has been a surprising fact that a great many of the large manufacturers of the country sought the aid of this committee and asked that it recommend a price-fixing commission. The answer to them is this: Gentlemen, while you may be able to stand it and desire the Government to fix your prices now, thinking that you would get a high price for your commodities, or a better price, the demand from the consumers would be greater in the last analysis than anything the manufacturer could hope to withstand, and his price would be reduced and reduced and reduced until finally business would be on crutches. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, then, to the problem before us of "unscrambling the eggs." What have we done to carry out this economical theory? Mr. NELSON has said we have done nothing. Let us see what we have done in the way of new legislation, in the way of doing new things that had behind them the shadow of old and well-known vices that need correcting.

Let us see what we have done for the individual, who is, after all, the unit of American citizenship. When you have taken care of the individual you have builded a solid rock foundation upon which to erect your superstructure. So we have started with the individual, by giving him rights that he has never possessed under the law—not for the injury of another, but for the protection of himself.

First, we found that the Sherman law did not permit an injunction on petition of an individual. The Government could enjoin a combination or trust; and though an individual was standing face to face with destruction, though the monster of monopoly was knocking at his door, he would have to wait until destruction came, and then pursue his remedy at law for treble damages. So the Democratic Party, through its membership on the committee, proposed to place in this bill a law which allows the individual to sue for equitable relief and to enjoin monopoly when he is threatened with irreparable loss or damage. Is there anything in the Sherman law which gives that relief? I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] to point to anything in the Sherman law which gives that relief.

But we did not stop there. We went further in our effort to help the individual. We said "When you have been damaged in your business by a combination operating in restraint of trade we are going to put you no longer to the expense of gathering the testimony and of combating the wealth of the world in order to recover your damages." When the Government has procured a decree against the combination, we say now by the proposed statute that that decree shall be used by the individual and shall be conclusive evidence for all that it purports to be. So the individual who had what was considered relief under the Sherman law by way of treble damages, but who, in reality, never could recover them because of his inability to prove his case, now has the benefit of the proof of the Government placed at his disposal and made conclusive evidence in his behalf. Is there anything in the Sherman law which gives this relief? If there is, I challenge you to point it out.

But yet we were fair. We saw that it would be unfair to allow the decree to be conclusive evidence as to one party unless it were conclusive as to the other; and so in a spirit of fairness, even to big business, we made that decree applicable to both.

In addition to this, what have we done? We have said that while suit is pending on behalf of the Government the statute of limitations shall be suspended for the benefit of individuals until suit is concluded. Was there anything in the Sherman law that does that? Then why do you say we do nothing? Why does the great lawyer from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] say that the Sherman law covers everything that could possibly be done?

Let us see what else, my friends. Section 8 of the bill deals with a recognized evil of trust organization, "holding companies." We have had many speeches about the evils of holding companies, but we have never had anyone who was thoughtful enough to draw a bill on the subject, or kind enough even to furnish us with a form; speeches galore, but no bill. So the bill as drawn is original, and has that merit if no other.

But what does it do or attempt to do? At common law one corporation could not own the stock of another corporation, whether it was a competitor or not. They were confined to the ownership of their own stock. But under our statutes of various States corporations have sprung into existence empowered to own stock of other corporations. But it remained until within a quarter of a century for the real abuse of the system to be pointed out, and that came through the holding company, where gentlemen would organize one company and then put into that company 5 or 6 or 10 or 12 other companies, until the holding company had absorbed the stock of these other companies and issued its own stock in lieu thereof and become the real operating force of the half dozen corporations that had been combined into the one holding company. And so the Northern Securities case was brought. Now, my friend, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], tells us that we would not have won a decision in that case if this proposed holding-company provision of ours had been written into the law. I am inclined to think that my friend falls under the rule of Blackstone, who says no man ought to attempt to write a new law unless he is familiar with the old one; and my friend ought not to have attempted to discuss this proposed statute with regard to the Northern Securities case until he had first familiarized himself with that case.

Now, what was that case? It was the case of one New Jersey corporation, formed as a holding company pure and simple, into which by purchase was poured the stock of the three railroad companies which were natural competitors, and when that case was decided the Supreme Court held that it had not only lessened competition but had eliminated competition, and thus restrained trade.

We have supplemented the language of the statute and taken a forward step. We have gone forward, not backward. The Sherman law in its operation is limited to three things: First, a contract or combination in the form of a trust or otherwise; second, a conspiracy in restraint of trade; third, an attempt to monopolize. There is nothing about competition in the Sherman law. There must be actual restraint of trade under the Sherman law to bring anyone under either its civil or criminal process.

Under this bill there has to be only a lessening of competition. Competition may be lessened without restraint of trade. Competition may be lessened without attempt to monopolize. Competition may be lessened without conspiracy. It may be the natural effect of the putting together in close relationship through a holding company of two corporations that are natural competitors, or ought to be. Yet there would not be restraint. So, instead of subtracting from the Sherman law, as the gentleman has told the country, we have added to the Sherman law a most effective rule, by which the actions of these combinations in the future may be determined; but still, with due regard to the gentlemen who have come to love the Sherman law, we have left it intact, and have said by an express provision of our bill that nothing in our bill shall be construed to alter, amend, or repeal the Sherman law. It is as effective now as it has ever been.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Does the gentleman refer to paragraph 4 of section 15?

Mr. CARLIN. I refer to the paragraph which contains the language I have just recited.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will read it, it is very short. Does the gentleman mean to say that that leaves the Sherman Anti-trust Act in force?

Mr. CARLIN. I not only mean to say so, but every other man who understands the subject will say the same thing.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It says "Nothing in this section contained shall be deemed to alter, repeal, or amend section 266 of an act entitled 'An act to codify, revise,'" and so forth, approved March 3, 1911.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman has spoken on this matter for two hours. Now will he let me have a little time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The gentleman is mistaken; I only spoke about half an hour.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] says that this—the Sherman law—is a Republican law and has been a good, wholesome thing for the country, and that we owe it to the Republican Party. My friend, who is usually accurate in his statements, always beautiful in what he says, overlooked the history of the Sherman law, because if he will examine the record he will find that that law had its birth and origin in the State of Texas, that Senator Reagan, a Democrat, was the first man who ever undertook or attempted to control monopoly by statute in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

He says furthermore—and I am paying a great deal of attention to what the gentleman said, not only because I want to pay him that compliment, but because he has frequently said—that we need nothing more than the Sherman law, claims credit for the Republican Party, and in the next breath rails against sections 2 and 4 of the bill, not realizing that he is criticizing his own party, because of the 21 States that have found it necessary to adopt that character of progressive legislation 14 are Republican States and 7 Democratic.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit an interrogation?

Mr. CARLIN. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman know that the basis or standard of these State laws is totally different from the standard you have introduced into this law? Here it is the lessening of competition and there it is restraining of trade and monopoly.

Mr. CARLIN. I know just the reverse. I was speaking with reference to discriminatory statutes, or statutes against discrimination, and the principle is the same. Every one of these States has tried to compel uniform prices within the borders of the State. The penalty and methods have been different, but the statutes have been aimed at that.

Now, to go back to holding companies. A holding company has been the device, as I have said, by which every trust combination has ever organized in our land, and yet we are told that we should leave the Sherman law alone. When we know that destruction of competition is now the goal sought, we ought to apply the rule of reason. We are engaged in an effort to bring about competition; that is the economics of this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Unless you have taken the trouble to understand what we are driving at, of course you can not tell the direction in which we are going.

Now, let us see what else we do. As to interlocking directorates, the gentleman from Pennsylvania said there was nothing proposed in this bill that could not be prosecuted under the Sherman law. Can he point to a single prosecution of any individual because he has been a director in more than one competing company?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. To be a director in more than one corporation was not a crime, but if a man was a director in more than one competing company creating a monopoly or a restraint of trade, it could be introduced in evidence that he was destroying that competition.

Mr. CARLIN. It was one of the things allowed to be introduced in evidence as a link in the chain, but not of itself was it ever considered an offense until it was proposed in this bill.

Let us see why it is proposed and what this bill means. After all, gentlemen, this is the provision in the bill that self-constituted champions of little business seem to be railing against. The fact is, when we analyze it, little business, if railing at the bill at all, is doing it at the bid of big business, because we do not strike at little business, but, on the contrary, specifically exclude it and exempt it from the bill.

Now, interlocking directorates has come to be an evil so well known that the men who have given that character of business an impetus by the loan of their names have come to see it. Mr. Morgan resigned at one time 47 directorships, and stated that he did it in response to public sentiment. He will do it in the future in response to a public statute. [Laughter and applause.]

There are two evils in interlocking directorates. My friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] complained of the bill in that respect. He would not have done it if he had read the last bill, because his speech showed that he had read the tentative bill and not the bill as now proposed. Let us see the reasons for this statute. One man representing a great financial concern becomes a director in a great railroad. Then he becomes a director in a corporation that furnishes the railroad with supplies—oil, steel, coal—and by virtue of his trusteeship in the railroad directorship, what does he accomplish? If the railroad wants to borrow any money or sell its securities, he stays there, votes first that they need the extra money; secondly, that it shall be raised by the issue of bonds, and votes for that; third, he fixes the price at which these bonds shall be sold; fourth, he fixes the commission that the selling agent shall receive; and then, last but not least, he elects himself both selling agent and purchaser, at his own price. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell the House why it is that the committee, in writing this bill, thought it was necessary to exempt railroad companies from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. CARLIN. That is exactly what we have not done. I said, and I said it kindly, that my friend had not read this bill. I challenge him to point out any such provision.

Mr. MADDEN. The second paragraph of section 7 gives them authority to enter into all sorts of traffic associations, operating and accounting associations, and the subject matters of contract which are authorized under this section to be entered into, subject only to the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. And the contracts themselves are only necessary to be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and over these contracts the Interstate Commerce Commission has no jurisdiction whatever.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman makes a good speech, but he has made that speech once already.

Mr. MADDEN. I am making it again so that the gentleman will understand it.

Mr. CARLIN. But he ought not to inflict it on the House in my time.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, the gentleman challenged me to tell him the location of it in the bill, and I have done it.

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; and I am going to answer the gentleman. That provision in the bill, like every other provision which affects common carriers, was drawn to prevent interference with the Interstate Commerce Commission, because, as I have said, this country has reached the economical doctrine, so far as common carriers are concerned, of regulation and control, and we propose to do nothing that will change that system for the present. The Interstate Commerce Commission recommended to us that we place that provision in the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is there with their consent, with their advice, and in assistance of the doctrine of regulation and control.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. For a question.

Mr. MADDEN. I simply wanted to say that the mere fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission recommended this proposition does not answer the question that I asked the gentleman.

Mr. CARLIN. Oh, but it answers this. To read that provision simply means that we have allowed them to meet, which they might not now have the right to do, and to enter into lawful agreements, and the word "lawful" is used, and they are subject to the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and before that provision was put in the bill we sent it to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they sent it back with their approval. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that the Interstate Commerce Commission has any jurisdiction whatever over the agreements into which these railroads are authorized to enter?

Mr. CARLIN. I think they have, absolutely.

Mr. MADDEN. Absolutely they have not.

Mr. CARLIN. If they have not, then I suggest to the gentleman that he submit a plan and propose an amendment that will make it plain.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I propose to do.

Mr. CARLIN. I hope the gentleman will, but I hope he will take time enough to read the section before he undertakes to amend it.

As to interlocking directorates, I have pointed out one evil that comes from them. That is not all. The director sits on the great railroad corporation directorate and buys supplies from himself. He is a fiduciary, for that is what a director is. He sits on the one board and buys supplies for himself from the other corporation upon whose board he sits, until we find him buying and selling to himself, and we are big enough not to object to that, if it were not for the fact that he is doing it with other people's money, and so we put a provision covering that evil into the bill. We divided this interlocking directorate bill into three subdivisions—first, the railroads and the common carriers, over which Congress has undisputed jurisdiction; second, national banks, over which we have undisputed jurisdiction; and, third, industrial corporations and combinations. We have exempted the little fellow, the mutual savings bank, and we have gone to the limit of two and a half million dollars in other banks. When a bank gets to be the size of two and a half million dollars it is pretty well grown, and, when you get them into a combination, the opportunity for evil is very great.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not mean that the two million and a half exemption has any application to the industrial corporations?

Mr. CARLIN. Oh, no; we apply an entirely different rule to the industrial corporations. A man can be a director in as many industrial corporations as he pleases under our bill, unless those corporations would of themselves constitute by combination a violation of the Sherman law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question on that point?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If the language in the bill were plain that it must constitute a violation of the Sherman law, I might have no objection to it, but you have introduced a new standard, to lessen competition, and you say wherever an agreement between two companies will lessen competition it shall be declared to be illegal. You can not get two corporations pursuing the same business having interlocking directorates without violating that principle.

Mr. CARLIN. My friend, it is true that you and I are not as young as we used to be, but I hope that we have not yet gotten too old to be willing to do a new thing once in a while. I have been contending that we are doing a new thing. It is the purpose of this bill to do new things, but we are doing them in supplement to existing law, and not by way of disturbing existing law.

What else have we done that is new? For 20 years organized labor has knocked at the doors of American Congresses, asking relief from certain things of which it complained. There was no response until the Democratic House undertook to give relief, and so we passed a bill called the Clayton injunction bill, and another called the Clayton contempt bill, through the Democratic House, and sent these bills to a Republican Senate. I mean no disrespect to the Senate when I say that there was, while its membership was Republican, a morgue concealed somewhere around the premises, and that it seemed that whenever legislation that had the merit of being new was attempted it found its way to that morgue, and these two bills went there, and so it has remained until now for a Democratic Congress, in both of its branches, to let labor understand whether we propose to carry out our platform pledges or whether we do not. As an evidence of what our intentions are, we have written them into this bill. I want to say that I yield to no one in my regard for the man who earns his living by the sweat of his brow. I have known what it means to labor. I have known what it means to be poor. I have worn the badge of poverty, and I have suffered the distresses which come from need, and every fiber of my nature responds to the demand of the wage earner whenever it is possible under our form of constitutional government to yield to his rightful demand.

For years the courts of our country have thrown out dragnet injunctions, issued them in blank, the marshal having the right to fill in a multitude of names, and the names were filled in from time to time as he passed them on the street, peaceful or violent, it mattered not, if they were in line of his march. They were brought into court and fined for contempt of court, for violating an injunction they had never seen and of which they had never heard, a system and a practice that is most pernicious, everyone will so admit. This bill proposes that in contempts committed without the presence of the court to require a rule to be issued and a process to be served and the individual brought into court, and then when brought there not to be subjected to the whim or caprice of the court but to be tried by 12 of his countrymen to determine whether he had been guilty of a crime or not. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We were told this was an attack upon the courts. My friends, if you commit murder, arson, or any other crime you are entitled to a trial by jury, but if you commit the crime of being ignorant of an injunction that was issued by a Federal judge you are not entitled to a trial by a jury, but only by the judge himself. And we have concluded in this great country of ours, where every man is equal before the law, that he shall have an opportunity to be heard and tried by his countrymen when his life and liberty are at stake. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But in our desire to do right by the citizen we have done no wrong to the court, because we have carefully reserved the right of the court to maintain its dignity and its power for contempts that are committed in its presence. So again we have adhered to part of the old, which was right, and had the courage to take a step forward to the new, which is likewise right. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, my friends, to reply finally to the demagogue who is present everywhere, and whom we know find in chorus saying, "Do not disturb the business of the country by any more legislation; stop where you are, you have done well enough," and so say the letters which were read from New York to-day, "go no further, you will disturb the business interests of the country," and the press in certain sections of the country have taken up the siren song.

I will tell you now, my colleagues, why we do not stop. I will tell you why we are going forward with this legislation; and if we must commercialize it I will tell you why from the standpoint of business. First, the business world has a right to know what we are going to do, and if it is disturbed at all it is disturbed by reason of uncertainty, and the sooner we pass this bill and let them know under what rule business is to be controlled the sooner business prosperity will be accentuated. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We say to business not to stop, but to go on. Secondly, we promised this legislation to the country in our platform. Should we stop now, what would be said? I can imagine my friend from Illinois and my friend from Pennsylvania saying, with burning eloquence, "If we would only stop; oh, if we would only do it," and turning to the country and saying, "They were afraid to go on." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] "They have sold out to the trusts." [Applause on the Democratic side.] "They dare not go forward." But, no; the membership of this House is going to battle in November with the enemy. Do not go in with cold feet; and we must not go in with cold feet; and so now we are doing the thing which appeals to business. We are going to settle the question that for 20 years the Republican Party has been afraid to approach. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The same men who cry out now, "Do not go any further; these bills will ruin the country," told us the same thing about the currency bill. Now they say it is a splendid bill, and they were mistaken. [Applause.] And when this bill comes into operation, what will you find, not that we have destroyed the game of business, if it may be so designated, but we have simply changed the rules by which it is to be played. We have broken up the brutal center rush, the wedge play, and substituted in its stead the "forward pass." [Laughter and applause.] So that the game has become open and fair, and more people can play it with peace and with profit. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman is a football player, he will admit that the forward pass is not so much easier.

Mr. CARLIN. But it is much fairer and less brutal [applause on the Democratic side], and so many more people can play it. And so it is, gentlemen of the House, that your committee has finished its labors; it has brought to you a bill which embodies the best intellect and thought of the country, political and economical. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It has brought to you a bill that was born and has lived in the open, a bill that was drafted by the hands of your own colleagues. Not a line of that bill came from anybody's pocket or anybody's office, departmental or otherwise. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If we have made mistakes, we have made them in the effort to do the right thing by our party and by our country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have had before us the inspiration of a matchless leader [applause on the Democratic side], a man willing to do the right and the courage with which to do it. And so we confidently believe that this House will give its approval, and when you have done so and written it upon the statute books it is my confident belief that posterity will rise up and call you blessed. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one hour and five minutes remaining.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FITZHENRY], a member of the committee.

[Mr. FITZHENRY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY].

[Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

[Mr. BRYAN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask, before the gentleman proceeds, whether it is the intention to go on with the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule now until half past 5.

Mr. WEBB. It is my intention to have the first section of the bill read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MADDEN. With the understanding that it is open to amendment when we meet again?

Mr. WEBB. You mean section 1?

Mr. MADDEN. Section 1.

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that under the rule the bill originally introduced would have to be read, of course. Does the gentleman intend to read that or the amendment?

Mr. WEBB. I think the rule dispenses with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not understand the Chair. The amendment submitted by the committee proposes to strike out all the sections of the bill. Unless there is some agreement by unanimous consent, the original bill will have to be read first.

Mr. WEBB. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the original bill, which was stricken out by amendment, be omitted, and that we begin to read the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the rule provides for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not the rule before him.

Mr. WEBB. If there are any amendments, of course I do not wish to cut off any right to offer them.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule says that the substitute shall be read instead of the bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That "antitrust laws," as used herein, includes the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; sections 73 to 77, inclusive, of an act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," of August 27, 1894; an act entitled "An act to amend sections 73 and 76 of the act of August 27, 1894, entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,'" approved February 12, 1913; and also this act.

"Commerce," as used herein, means trade or commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State, Territory, or foreign nation, or between any insular possessions or other places under the jurisdiction of the United States, or between any such possession or place and any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or any foreign nation, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory or any insular possesion or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States.

The word "person" or "persons" wherever used in this act shall be deemed to include corporations and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of either the United States, the laws of any of the Territories, the laws of any State, or the laws of any foreign country.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question before the gentleman moves to rise. I have no amendment to any of these definitions, but I want to ask that this paragraph be not considered as closed to amendment, so if any person wants to offer an amendment at the next session of the committee I would like it be understood that such permission will be granted.

Mr. WEBB. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] if he has an amendment to offer.

Mr. MADDEN. There may be some person that would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have not, but I would like very much to have it deferred.

Mr. WEBB. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I will agree that it remain open for amendment when we next meet.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement it will be left open for amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SIXTH INTERNATIONAL DENTAL CONGRESS AT LONDON (H. DOC. NO. 998).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and,

with accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of a provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law," I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the British Government to that of the United States to send delegates to the Sixth International Dental Congress, to be held at London, from August 3 to 8, 1914, and a letter from the Department of the Interior showing the favor with which that department views the proposed gathering.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 26, 1914.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF NEUROLOGY, PSYCHIATRY, AND PSYCHOLOGY, AT BERNE (H. DOC. NO. 997).

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of a provision contained in the deficiency act of March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law," I transmit herewith, for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation and the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of Switzerland to that of the United States to send delegates to an international congress on neurology, psychiatry, and psychology, to be held at Berne, Switzerland, from September 7 to September 12, 1914, and a letter from the Department of the Interior showing the views of that department with regard to the proposed congress and recommending an appropriation of not to exceed $500 to defray the expenses of participation by the Government of the United States.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 26, 1914.

PORTRAIT OF HON. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks unanimous consent to lay before the House a letter from Mrs. John Sharp Williams, concerning a matter that will interest a great many Members. Without objection, the Clerk will read it.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

MAY 26, 1914.

Members of the Sixtieth Congress who are still Members of the House of Representatives.

GENTLEMEN: I wish to express to you my thanks for the gift of the splendid portrait of my husband. The best years of his life were spent as a fellow member of your body. This token of your friendship and appreciation is most gratifying to him, and will always be one of my chief treasures.

Most sincerely, BETTY D. WILLIAMS.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HELVERING, for 15 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BORLAND, for 5 days, in order to attend the International Arbitration Conference at Lake Mohonk, N. Y.

To Mr. RAGSDALE, indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

ADJOURNMENT OVER SATURDAY, MEMORIAL DAY.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to the proposition that when the House adjourns on Friday it stand adjourned until Monday following.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Friday it stand adjourned until Monday. Is there objection?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I shall object to that.

The SPEAKER. Who made the objection?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I did. I withdraw it.

Mr. WEBB. Reserving the right to object. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Ohio if he will not withhold that request until Friday. We can then tell better with regard to the prospects of legislation.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Saturday is Memorial Day, and I think it is the usual practice to adjourn over that day.

Mr. WEBB. That is true; but then we did not have a special rule on the subject. If the gentleman will wait until Friday, we can then see what can be done. I withdraw the objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MINING STRIKE IN COLORADO.

Mr. KINDEL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KINDEL. I would like to have unanimous consent to publish the report from the State mine inspector as to conditions in Colorado, how they are improving materially, together with resolutions by the Scottish Rite Masons on the labor strike.

The SPEAKER. What was the first paper?

Mr. KINDEL. A report of the State coal-mine inspector.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a statement from the State mine inspector of Colorado and also certain resolutions passed by the Scottish Rite Masons of Colorado on the subject of the strike or disturbance in Colorado. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker. What is the necessity of inserting this report of the State mine inspector in the RECORD? What is the purpose?

Mr. KINDEL. The purpose is to notify you and others, and show you what has been done.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Has it any bearing on the strike conditions out there?

Mr. KINDEL. Not at all, excepting to show what is being done.

Mr. FOSTER. What does this show? It shows certain documents with reference to the strike, does it?

Mr. KINDEL. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FOSTER, objects, and likewise the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BUCHANAN.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBB. When the House adjourns this afternoon, under the rule do we adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, or at 12 o'clock?

The SPEAKER. Until 12 o'clock.

Mr. DONOVAN. How about a night session to-night?

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEBB. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 27, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 27, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we look to Thee to inspire and to answer our prayer. We come to Thee with a heart-hunger that has never been satisfied in all the gifts of Providence in this life. We come to Thee amid the unrest of life that hath found no abiding city. One by one we pass out into the great beyond, into the unseen which we believe to be eternal. Shadows lie athwart our pathway. We lift our hearts to Thee, the source of light and life and power. We thank Thee for the light that gleams along the pathway. We pray that Thou, amidst the encircling gloom, will lead us on, and when the shadows break may our eyes open to the light of an eternal day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (James M. Baker) read the following communication:

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE, UNITED STATES SENATE,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 264) authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the Sixth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the joint resolution just received from the House be laid before the Senate and read at length.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 264) authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the Sixth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept an invitation extended by the Government of the French Republic to the Government of the United States to participate by delegates in the Sixth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, to be held at Paris from the 8th to the 10th of June, 1914: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted for expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with the said conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE. I am authorized by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report back favorably the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts ask for its immediate consideration?

Mr. LODGE. I ask for its immediate consideration. The congress meets the 10th of June, and action must be taken at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BUILDING.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have here a memorial from the Southern California Chapter of the American Institute of Architects relating to the architectural work on the proposed building for the Department of Justice. It contains some very interesting facts and data. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF ARCHITECTS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Los Angeles, Cal., May 21, 1914.

Hon. JOHN D. WORKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Southern California Chapter of the American Institute of Architects herewith begs to inclose a statement prepared by the institute's committee on Government architecture, relating to the matter of the building for the Department of Justice in Washington, D. C., and also a detailed account of the competition, the subsequent developments, and the legislation referred to in the statement.

As the institute has been unable to secure assurances from the United States Treasury Department that the Government will abide by the results of the competition, this chapter earnestly requests of you to use all your influence in order that the matter of the bill now under consideration in the House and the parallel legislation that is to be introduced in the Senate may receive serious consideration.

Yours, respectfully,

FERNAND PARMENTIER, Secretary.

STATEMENNT IN THE MATTER OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BUILDING.

In May, 1908, an appropriation of $2,500,000 was made to purchase land for a group of Government buildings for the Departments of State, of Justice, and of Commerce and Labor.

This project was looked upon as so important that the Secretary of the Treasury decided to institute a competition to select an architect for each of these three buildings. To assure the widest opportunity of choice 60 of the leading architects in the United States received and accepted an invitation to compete, 20 being invited for each building.

The program was perfectly definite in its statements that the competition was for the selection of three architects to whom the erection of these buildings would be awarded, stating that "the selection of one of the designs by the Secretary of the Treasury and its subsequent approval by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the head of the department to occupy the building would be final and conclusive," and, further, "that the successful competitor would be designated to prepare drawings and specifications and locally supervise the construction of the building."

The competition was judged by three separate juries, composed of five architects each. The award was made January 6, 1911. The 60 competitors and 15 judges acted throughout in the belief that the Government, in good faith, had committed itself to the award and to the execution of these three buildings by the architects selected.

The three winners were called upon to develop and harmonize their plans, and a contract for the architectural services in connection with the building for the Department of Justice was signed August 28, 1911. It constituted a definite contract for preliminary services as far as the appropriation enabled the department to act at that time, and stated that the supplementary contract would be made when the building was authorized.

The first payment was made to the winner of the building for the Department of Justice on September 11, 1911, in amount of $19,431.85. This was a partial payment on account of the preliminary contract, and represented not only what was due at that time for the competition drawings, but also eight months' work in revising and completing the preliminary drawings.

Work was continued on the plans by the winner until the spring of 1913, when he was advised by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury not to do any further work. Subsequent to this he was notified in January, 1914, to go to Washington to discuss changes in the position of the building and to prepare another estimate of cost, thereby receiving assurance that the administration proposed to carry on its agreement with him.

H. R. 12801, a bill for an appropriation for the Department of Justice, followed along the same lines and provided that the architect selected in the competition should execute this building. The Attorney General gave evidence on this bill at a hearing on February 6, 1914, and the Secretary of the Treasury gave evidence at a hearing on February 25, 1914, opposing this bill and proposing in its place H. R. 13870, the bill now under consideration, which gives authority to a commission to appoint an architect, either by competition or selection, to render partial services in the preparation of the plans under the control of the Supervising Architect. While it is true that this bill does not definitely state that the architect already selected by the competition would not be appointed as the architect of the building, yet inasmuch as this bill, which specifically puts it in the power of the commission to appoint an architect other than the architect already selected, takes the place of a prior bill introduced in the House, which gave definite assurance that the building would be built according to the designs of the architect originally selected, the assumption is plain that if it was the intention of the Government to proceed along the original lines no change would have been made in the bill first introduced.

The details of the case, which in the statement given above have chiefly to do with the building for the Department of Justice, because that building is the only one now under consideration, do not affect the great question involved, namely, that of national fair play. The Government, through its authorized agents, made a promise which was accepted in good faith. No reason has been advanced for breaking that promise, and the subsequent change of method in the administration of governmental architecture as now advocated by the Government should not affect the fulfillment of a promise previously made.

NEW YORK, May 9, 1914.

DETAILED STATEMENT.

The Government competition held in the latter part of 1910 for the three buildings for the Department of State, Department of Justice, and Department of Commerce and Labor was, taken as a whole, the largest and in some respects the most important that has ever been instituted in this country. Sixty of the leading architects of the country were invited by the Government to compete, and accepted. Twenty architects competed for each of the three buildings. The competition was carefully conducted by the Department of the Treasury, judged by expert jurors, the decision of the jury confirmed, and the award finally made to three architects.

The following is the list of competitors and jury for each of the three buildings:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Donaldson & Meier, Detroit, Mich.
Holabird & Roche, Chicago, Ill.
Abram Garfield, Omaha, Nebr.
Green & Wicks, Buffalo, N. Y.
Richards, McCarty & Bulford, Columbus, Ohio.

JURY.

Pierce Anderson, of Chicago.
Henry Bacon, of Philadelphia.
Glenn Brown, secretary of the American Institute of Architects.
John B. Pine and D. Everett Waid, of New York City.

The program for this competition, which was issued in September, 1910, stated that "This competition is one of three which will be instituted simultaneously for the selection of three architects, to whom the erection of the three buildings for the Department of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor will be awarded."

It was therefore a competition for the selection of an architect, not necessarily for the selection of a design, and the architect was to be intrusted with the erection of the building. The program further stated that "The selection of one of the designs by the Secretary of the Treasury, and its subsequent approval by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the head of the executive department to occupy the building shall be final and conclusive."

The program further stated that "The architect to whom the commission is awarded shall revise his competitive drawings to meet the further requirements of the Secretary of the Treasury and the officials of the department to occupy the building, and upon the basis of these revised preliminary drawings shall prepare full detailed working drawings and specifications for said building, and shall thereafter from time to time make such changes in the drawings and specifications as may be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, for which just compensation shall be allowed; but no changes in the drawings and specifications shall be made without written authority from the Secretary of the Treasury.

"The architect (or architects) to whom said commission shall be awarded will receive in compensation for full professional services, including local supervision of the building, a fee computed at the rate of 6 per cent upon the cost of the work executed from his drawings and specifications and under his superintendence. The sum upon which the architect's commission is to be computed shall be the actual construction cost of the building as ascertained from the net amount of contracts awarded and proposals accepted for additions or deductions."

The conditions of the competition and the interest expressed in the program were accepted not only by the 60 architects competing but by the American Institute of Architects, the profession at large, by the President and Cabinet, by Congress, by the press, and the public at large.

The competition drawings were finally delivered as required at the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury in Washington, on December 30, 1910. The competitions were judged and notifications were received from Secretary of the Treasury MacVeagh as to the awards on January 6, 1911, and the successful architects found to be for the Department of State, Arnold W. Brunner; Department of Justice, Donn Barber; and Department of Commerce and Labor, York & Sawyer.

A public exhibition of all of the competitive drawings was held in Washington, and the entire matter received very wide publicity in the press and aroused throughout the country general approbation and enthusiasm.

Shortly after the competitions were won Messrs. Brunner, Barber, and York & Sawyer were called together by the then Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Franklin MacVeagh, and were instructed by him to develop their individual buildings with the heads of the departments for which they were intended, having constantly in view at the same time the reconciliation of the designs to each other and the architectural harmony of the group as a whole.

They were asked to harmonize the façades, which was not a serious matter, as it happened, and to present as soon as possible all three buildings in group form, both in plan and elevation, for the consideration of the Commission of Fine Arts. Soon after this a meeting was held with the Commission of Fine Arts, when certain further instructions were received. The work then proceeded, including the study of a more detailed plan arrangement for each building. All this represented considerable effort and expense, took several months, and lasted well into the summer.

On June 16, 1911, the three architects again appeared before the Commission of Fine Arts in Washington, with the required block plans and elevations, bird's-eye views, and perspective sketches of the group. At this meeting the approval of the general preliminary plans was received, which approval is on record, and was transmitted in writing to Hon. Charles D. Hillis, then Secretary to the President. A day or two later the three architects were called to a meeting with the President and his Cabinet, in the White House, and there this same series of drawings was carefully examined, passed on, and approved in general by them.

The plans of the buildings were then taken up separately with the respective departments, and the drawings for the Department of Justice were finally approved and received the signature of the President, Secretary of the Treasury, Attorney General, and the Supervising Architect, all on August 22, 1911. In the meantime there had been filed with the Supervising Architect of the Treasury estimates for this building, in the form required by him, which estimates were accepted, placed on file, and a contract was prepared under date of July 24, 1911. This contract was finally executed on August 28, 1911, after the drawings had been signed and approved, and a first payment was then made to Donn Barber on September 11, 1911, in the sum of $19,431.85. This completed the conditions required by the program of competition, and then a more detailed study of the drawings was begun with a view to the making of final working drawings. The contract awarded was in the nature of a preliminary contract and called for certain mentioned services to be rendered, for all of which the Government was to pay $48,579.64.

The reason the contract was drawn in this form was that, of the $200,000 called for to be used for designs and estimates for the three buildings, only $160,000 had been actually appropriated. The net balance available from this appropriation was $158,203.36, $1,786.64 having been expended for the compensation of the judges, expense of the competition, etc. This balance added to the $40,000 left to be appropriated made a total of $198,203.36, which amount was then divided proportionately among the three architects of the three buildings—Mr. Brunner, $56,269.94; Donn Barber, $48,579.64; and York & Sawyer, $93,353.78. The contracts were made, therefore, to the full extent of the moneys held available, and the services required under these contracts were proportioned to these amounts.

It was then further agreed in the contracts that in the event that Congress should hereafter grant the necessary authority therefor the Government would enter into supplemental contracts for the further architectural services required in connection with the erection and completion of the buildings and pay a total of 6 per cent for the full services to be rendered.

The preliminary contract was a contract distinctly showing the intent and willingness on the part of the Government to proceed in the usual way should Congress finally decide to go ahead with the work.

Nothing further was done by the Department of the Treasury until just before the last administration went out on March 4, 1913. Secretary MacVeagh, under date of February 28, 1913, wrote a letter to Congress recommending that authority be given the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts to provide sufficient accommodations for the several departments, and that the appropriation known as "Architectural competitions" be made available for the payment of fees to the architects, and accompanying this was a draft of a bill, in which is stated in the last paragraph "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, further authorized and empowered to enter into supplemental contracts with each of the architects whose designs have been accepted for the department buildings hereinabove authorized," etc.

This bill of Secretary MacVeagh's, of course, coming so late, was never passed, but the intent plainly expressed all the way through all of the negotiations, letters, and in the contract is that the successful architect of the competition had the approval and support of the administration and was surely promised the execution of the building. In other words, as far as the competitors were concerned, they were plainly invited to compete for the building and not merely for sketches and estimates for the building. It seems that herein lies the real moral obligation willingly incurred by the Government.

When the present administration came in the needs for the building for the Department of Justice were found to be pressing. Attorney General McReynolds therefore introduced a bill asking for an appropriation for $3,000,000 for the building and contemplating the employment of the architect to whom this work had been awarded in competition, namely, Mr. Donn Barber. The Secretary of the Treasury in perfecting plans for a more complete organization of the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, believing that all Government work should be executed under the supervision of this department, and in pursuance of this policy, believing that the supervision of this building should not be intrusted to the architect and that his compensation should be based not on full service but on partial service, put in a substitute bill referred to below. Whether or not his policy in regard to the Office of the Supervising Architect is a wise one or not, it seems hardly applicable to this case, where the Government has already committed itself, as far as possible, to another course.

The bill drawn by Attorney General McReynolds, H. R. 12801, was drawn during the absence of the Secretary of the Treasury in the West. On hearing of it and finding that it did not conform to his policy, he had a bill drawn and presented to Congress, H. R. 13870, which gives the commission in charge of this building the authority to disregard the previous obligation entered into by the Government and distinctly directs that the architect appointed to carry out this work shall not supervise the erection of the building.

The rest of the history is shown by these two bills, H. R. 12801 and H. R. 13870, appended hereto, and by the No. 10 hearing before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, House of Representatives, on H. R. 12801, buildings for the Department of Justice, February 6, 1914, which is the hearing of Mr. McReynolds before the committee; and No. 14 hearing before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, House of Representatives, on H. R. 12801, building for the Department of Justice, February 25, 1914, which is the hearing of Mr. McAdoo before the same committee; and the report, No. 368, of the same committee accompanying H. R. 13870, March 11, 1914, which reports the bill favorably to the House of Representatives.

NEW YORK, May 9, 1914.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1005) to reimburse William Van Derveer, of Millboro, Va., for excess revenue taxes assessed against and collected from him, to submit an adverse report (No. 559) thereon. I ask that the bill may be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. GRONNA, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4988) to provide for the disposal of certain lands in the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 561) thereon.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 647) to amend an act entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment," approved April 23, 1904 (33 Stat. L., p. 302), as amended by the act of March 3, 1909 (35 Stat. L., p. 796), reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 560) thereon.

Mr. NORRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1125) for the relief of the heirs of Ann Gregory, deceased, to submit an adverse report (No. 562) thereon. I ask that the bill be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. NORRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1289) for the relief of Lemuel E. Cook, to submit an adverse report (No. 563) thereon. I ask that the bill be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

INTERNATIONAL DENTAL CONGRESS.

Mr. SAULSBURY. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably with an amendment in the nature of a substitute the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 105) authorizing the President to appoint delegates to the International Dental Congress to be held in London, England, August 3 to 8, 1914, and I submit a report (No. 558) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to accept an invitation extended by the Government of Great Britain to that of the United States to be represented by delegates in the Sixth International Dental Congress, to be held at London, August 3 to 8, 1914, and is authorized to appoint 15 delegates to such Congress: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time for expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with said congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the Sixth International Dental Congress."

ENFORCEMENT OF ALASKAN LAWS.

Mr. PITTMAN. From the Committee on Territories I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 11740) to amend an act entitled "An act creating a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska and conferring legislative power thereon, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I will state that the bill has passed the other House as an emergency measure. It has been approved by the members of the Committee on Territories of the Senate. The passage of the bill is essential to prevent the necessity of calling a special session of the Territorial Legislature of the District of Alaska. By some defect in the legislation, the district courts and the district officers have no jurisdiction over the matter of the collection and enforcement of the payment of taxes and other dues.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That nothing in that act of Congress entitled "An act creating a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska and conferring legislative power thereon, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, shall be so construed as to prevent the courts now existing or that may be hereafter created in said Territory from enforcing within their respective jurisdictions all laws passed by the legislature within the power conferred upon it, the same as if such laws were passed by Congress, nor to prevent the legislature passing laws imposing additional duties, not inconsistent with the present duties of their respective offices, upon the governor, marshals, deputy marshals, clerks of the district courts, and United States commissioners acting as justices of the peace, judges of probate courts, recorders, and coroners, and providing the necessary expenses of performing such duties, and in the prosecuting of all crimes denounced by Territorial laws the costs shall be paid the same as is now or may hereafter be provided by act of Congress providing for the prosecution of criminal offenses in said Territory, except that in prosecutions growing out of any revenue law passed by the legislature the costs shall be paid as in civil actions, and such prosecutions shall be in the name of the Territory.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to object to this proposed legislation, because I do not like to object to legislation pertaining to the Territory of Alaska, but if I may be allowed to make the statement, I will say that, in my judgment, this bill proposes to confer upon the proposed Legislature of the Territory of Alaska powers equal to the powers of Congress and far in excess of any powers ever granted to any legislature in the history of the Government. It proposes to give unlimited power to the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska to impose upon the officers appointed, from justices of the peace up to the Federal judges, marshals, and United States attorneys, any duties that it chooses to place upon such officers that are not inconsistent with some law of Congress. Of course, there is no law of Congress inconsistent with it; but it seems to me it is giving pretty sweeping powers. The bill ought to be very carefully guarded. I suppose the committee has fully considered the matter.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I object to the present consideration of the bill. I wish to have an opportunity to examine it with some care.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. PITTMAN subsequently said: In behalf of the Committee on Territories, I ask leave to withdraw the report on House bill 11740.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION OF SEA FISHERY INDUSTRIES.

Mr. LODGE. For the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who is obliged to be absent from the city, I report from the Committee on Foreign Relations a joint resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 151) authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in an international exposition of sea fishery industries was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to accept an invitation extended by the Government of France to that of the United States to be represented by a delegate at an International Exposition of Sea Fisheries, to be held at Boulogne-sur-mer, June 15 to October 1, 1914: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time for expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with said Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF OCCUPATIONAL DISEASES.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I report from the Committee on Foreign Relations a joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the International Congress of Occupational Diseases, for which I ask present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the International Congress on Occupational Diseases was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to accept an invitation extended by the Government of Austria-Hungary to that of the United States to be represented by delegates in an International Congress on Occupational Diseases, to be held at Vienna, September, 1914; and the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to defray the expenses of participation by the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF NEUROLOGY, ETC.

Mr. O'GORMAN. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report a joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the International Congress on Neurology, Psychiatry, and Psychology, and I ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 153) authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the International Congress on Neurology, Psychiatry, and Psychology was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to accept an invitation extended by the Government of Switzerland to the Government of the United States to be represented by delegates in an International Congress on Neurology, Psychiatry, and Psychology, to be held in Berne, Switzerland, from September 7 to September 12, 1914; and the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of participation by the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 5675) donating a bronze or brass condemned cannon to Crocker Post, Grand Army of the Republic, at Des Moines, Iowa, for cemetery purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 5676) granting an increase of pension to William H. Sperry (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRISTOW:

A bill (S. 5677) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912; to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

A bill (S. 5678) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the Blue Post, No. 250, Grand Army of the Republic, Topeka, Kans., three cannon or fieldpieces, to be placed in Rochester Cemetery; and

A bill (S. 5679) to remove the charge of desertion against Adam R. Hartzell (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 5680) granting a pension to Lyman E. Tibbits (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 5681) to amend an act approved June 22, 1910, entitled "An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands"; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. BRYAN (for Mr. FLETCHER):

A bill (S. 5682) granting an increase of pension to Catherine E. Prine; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 5683) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to certify to the Secretary of the Interior, for restoration to the public domain, all reservations that are not needed for naval purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 5684) to correct the military record of Oliver C. Rice and to grant him an honorable discharge; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 5685) granting a pension to Martha E. Reynolds (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 5686) granting a pension to Nancy Matsel; to the Committee on Pensions.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

DONATION OF CANNON.

Mr. McLEAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5495) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. DU PONT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5495) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for defraying the expenses incident to the Fifteenth International Congress against Alcoholism, to be held in the United States in 1915, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROOT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $200,000 for building slip and equipment at the navy yard, Puget Sound, Wash., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. JAMES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

EMELIE SMITH.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 378), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Emelie Smith, mother of Eli Smith, late a messenger to the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. MYERS. I have received the manuscript of an extremely interesting pamphlet on the history and administration of the General Land Office, by Francis H. White, professor of history in Pomona College, Claremont, Cal. I desire to have the manuscript printed as a Senate document, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing with the view to having it published as such.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE IN ENGLAND.

Mr. GORE. I desire to have printed as a public document a report of the special committee representing the American Bar Association appointed to investigate the English criminal law procedure and to recommend important reforms in American criminal law procedure. I ask that the report may be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, some time ago, in criticism of the administration of President Wilson, a Senator, in referring to the banking and currency bill passed during this Congress, said:

The passage of it was an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest.

If that statement were true it would indeed be a serious accusation. It is therefore important to inquire as to the verity of the statement. Mr. A. B. Hepburn, chairman of the board of directors of the Chase National Bank, of New York City, perhaps more nearly than any other man in the United States, represents the sentiment of the bankers of Wall Street. His contentions, therefore, may be considered as voicing the sentiment of the New York bankers.

BANKERS WANTED 1 CENTRAL BANK, BUT 12 WERE ESTABLISHED.

Mr. Hepburn was also chairman of the conference of the American Bankers' Association, which met in Chicago on August 22 and 23, 1913, and in his opening address contended for one central bank, saying:

Why should not the law create one central bank, which should have branches wherever there is commercial need for them? Such a plan would be acceptable, less cumbersome, more certain in operation, and far more efficient.

The American Bankers' Association was in favor of a central bank, but contended for not more than five Federal reserve banks if it was impossible to restrict the number to one. At the Chicago conference this was the resolution unanimously adopted:

It is the sense of this conference that one Federal reserve bank, with as many branches as the commerce of the country may require, would be most effective; but if this be not obtainable, we recommend that as few Federal reserve banks be established as possible and not more than a total number of five.

Was it "an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest" when the Congress determined, over their protest, that not less than 8 nor more than 12 Federal reserve banks should be established?

Why did Wall Street want one central reserve bank? It knew that as New York was the financial center of the United States, in all likelihood the one bank would be established in that city. It knew from past experience that the concentration of such enormous wealth in one city would perpetuate in Wall Street not only the control of the banking interests of the United States but also the power to control nearly every large new railway, commercial, and industrial enterprise to be undertaken in this country.

The hearings before the Pujo committee demonstrated that the large banking concerns of New York City are so connected by interlocking directorates, by ownership of stock, and by gentlemen's agreements that it is almost impossible for new, legitimate enterprises of any magnitude to be floated without the consent of the great New York bankers. The men owning the stock of the big banks of New York have large holdings in the great transportation, commercial, and industrial corporations of the United States. Any application for the financing of a competing enterprise, however meritorious, is often turned down by the bankers of New York because of the competition which will be created with the corporations in which they are interested, and thereby these great banks prevent the development which is so necessary to the upbuilding of our country. So long as there would be one central bank, this immense financial power could be wielded, as it heretofore has been, in the interest of those banks whose directors and stockholders are interested in or control the great transportation and industrial corporations.

The Wilson administration objected to the continuation of this power in Wall Street. It insisted that this concentration of wealth should be divided, so that there could be competing centers in the matter of banking and of the financing of new enterprises throughout the United States; that the hundreds of millions of reserves of national banks of the country should no longer be concentrated in New York. It therefore determined that there should be 12 Federal reserve banks; that the jurisdiction of the Federal reserve bank at New York should be limited, so that in that section at least three Federal reserve banks should be the centers of the great financial wealth of that portion of the country. A Federal reserve bank at Boston, with jurisdiction covering New England, and at Philadelphia, with jurisdiction covering Pennsylvania and New Jersey, should so divide this immense power which Wall Street has had that the banking centers of Boston and Philadelphia could compete with New York in the financing of new enterprises in the United States. It determined that the reserves in each of the 12 districts should be kept at the Federal reserve bank of that district; in other words, that the moneys should be kept where they belong—at home.

Was that action the Wilson administration "an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest"? If doing directly contrary to the expressed desires of Wall Street and the banking interest would indicate anything, it would be that the Wilson administration was determined to curb this power in Wall Street, which has strangled so many new, meritorious enterprises.

THE BANKERS OBJECTED TO THE COMPULSORY REQUIREMENT OF THE BILL, BUT FAILED TO GET MODIFICATION.

Mr. Hepburn and the bankers objected strenuously to what they termed the coercive feature of the bill, which provides that if any national banking association shall "fail within one year after its passage to become a member bank, or fail to comply with any of its provisions applicable thereto, all of the rights, privileges, and franchises of such association granted to it under the national-bank act shall be thereby forfeited." If there was one provision of the bill above another which met the united opposition of both Wall Street and the banking interest it was this compulsory feature.

Mr. Festus Wade, one of the delegates from the American Bankers' Association, who appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, used this language:

Again, to many of us, and I admit I am one, this bill is repulsive; it is a forced measure, a forced bill, the like of which was never put upon the statute books of any nation, where you say to men in the national banking system at this late day, "You must subscribe to this doctrine; take this stock; give up 10 per cent of your capital and 50 per cent of your reserve money, or you must go out of business or out of the national banking system." Gentlemen, that does not appear to me to be the spirit of the American people; it does not appear to me to be in accord with Democratic principles.

Nearly every banker who appeared before that committee protested against what they termed the compulsory requirement to surrender their charter or join the system created by the act. In the resolution prepared by Mr. A. B. Hepburn the following represents his view, and no doubt the view of Wall Street:

Resolved, That, considering these provisions collectively, we regard the measure as an attempt to force the national banks to contribute the capital and deposits in the Federal reserve banks, and we believe that the directors of the national banks, appreciating their responsibility in a fiduciary capacity to their stockholders and depositors, will not be so coerced until they have tested in the Supreme Court of the United States whether or not such coercion is a violation of the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the taking of property for public use without just compensation; and we further believe that even if it should be decided by the Supreme Court that it is not a constitutional violation the national banks of the country could not become parties to a banking system that proposes such revolutionary interference with the established credits now existing between the public and the national banks by the practical appropriation of one-third of all the actual money now in their possession, which is to be placed entirely beyond their control, both as regards its management and its use as valid reserves against their deposits, except in so far as the advice of the Federal advisory council might influence the action of the Federal Reserve Board, which, under the conditions and restrictions surrounding it, could not be made effective.

The bill as passed provided that the national banks surrender their charters unless they enter the system within one year. Was that "an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest"?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would rather finish this, and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

This compulsory feature, though apparently harsh, was absolutely essential to the accomplishment of the beneficent purposes of the bill. To have permitted the national banks to join or retire from the system at will would have seriously impaired, if not destroyed, the success of the measure. It would have created two classes of national banks, one acting independently of and the other under the Federal reserve system, yet each bearing the name national bank. It would have been confusing, if not deceiving, to depositors who might intend to deal with the bank having the advantages of the Federal reserve system. It was not a breach of good faith, because the national-bank act under which all national banks were incorporated provided that the right to amend, alter, or repeal the act is expressly reserved.

THE BANKERS INSISTED THEY SHOULD HAVE THREE MEMBERS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD; THEY SECURED NONE.

The delegation representing the American Bankers' Association insisted that they should have three members on the Federal Reserve Board. Mr. Festus Wade, in his presentation of the claims of that association, used this language:

Gentlemen, the duty assigned to me is to try to explain to you why there should be no compulsion in requiring the national banks to join reserve associations in a year and why we think we should have representation on the Federal board of control. * * *

But we can not conceive that it can be right that we should be called upon to put up this vast sum of money without representation.

In the testimony of Mr. James B. Forgan, president of the First National Bank of Chicago, Ill., the following colloquy took place:

Senator SHAFROTH. Mr. Forgan, the representation on the Federal Reserve Board which your convention has recommended—does it mean that the persons representing that interest shall be engaged in banking?

Mr. FORGAN. Yes, sir; that it be left to the banks to appoint them, and, of course, they would be likely to appoint bankers from among themselves.

Senator SHAFROTH. And you ask for three members upon the board?

Mr. FORGAN. Three; yes, sir.

When the bill was passed it contained a provision that the members of the Federal Reserve Board should be appointed by the President, and that no person engaged in the banking business should be eligible to serve. Was that "an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest"?

The reason members of the Federal Reserve Board should not be permitted to be interested in banks, either as officers or stockholders, is because it places them in incompatible positions. The Federal Reserve Board is vested with the power to determine the rate of discount of commercial paper. High rates of interest would be favorable to the banks but not to the people. Thus they would have a direct financial interest in the very orders they would make as members of the Federal Reserve Board. When rates of discount rise or fall stocks and bonds are immediately affected. The knowledge on the part of the members of the Federal Reserve Board that the rate of discount will be increased or diminished would give their banks immense advantage on the exchange in buying or selling bonds and stocks.

THE BANKERS OBJECTED TO THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD HAVING THE POWER TO REMOVE CLASS B DIRECTORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS, BUT WITHOUT AVAIL.

Of course, the bankers who appeared before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency objected to the Federal Reserve Board having the power to remove directors of class B of the Federal reserve banks. Mr. Wexler, vice president of the Whitney Central National Bank, of New Orleans, La., expressed that objection in these words:

We next come to the provision of the bill, as drawn, that provides that the directors of class B, namely, those elected to represent the agricultural and commercial interests of the country, may be removed by the Federal Reserve Board if it is found that they do not properly represent the agricultural and commercial interests. This provision is, in our opinion, fraught with considerable future embarrassment, if not possible danger. These particular directors, known as directors of class B, will be in constant fear of removal, and upon every loan upon which they will be called to vote they will naturally be influenced as to how the Federal Reserve Board will look upon their action, instead of being governed entirely by their sound judgment as to whether or not they should pass favorably or adversely upon the particular proposition, as it is presumed that they will want to hold their positions. * * *

We take the position that as the directors of class A and of class B have been elected by the shareholders of the Federal reserve banks they should only be removed by these shareholders.

When the bill was enacted it provided that the Federal Reserve Board should have the right to remove directors of class B of the Federal reserve banks. Was that "an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest"?

THE BANKS OBJECTED IN VAIN TO THE POWER BEING VESTED IN THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD TO REQUIRE ONE FEDERAL RESERVE BANK TO DISCOUNT THE PAPER OF ANOTHER.

The bankers objected strenuously to giving power to the Federal Reserve Board to require Federal reserve banks of one district to rediscount the paper of other Federal reserve banks. They contended that a board appointed by the President and composed of men who are not engaged in banking might by its orders cripple and injure the Federal reserve bank of one district to the advantage and benefit of that of another district. Yet, notwithstanding their opposition, when the bill was passed the provision objected to was incorporated in the act. Was that "an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest"?

There were good reasons for the vesting of this power in the Federal Reserve Board. If one Federal reserve bank should have a large surplus of cash, and another, though possessed of a great quantity of prime commercial paper, be short of cash, why should not an impartial board have the power to compel the locked-up money to be sent to where it is needed as long as there is no objection to the securities offered? It would relieve a stringency in the money market in one district and prevent a redundancy of the currency in the other. It would accelerate commerce, and thereby be of vast benefit to the people.

THE BANKERS DESIRED A PROVISION THAT INTEREST SHOULD BE PAID ON THEIR RESERVES, BUT THEIR REQUEST WAS DENIED.

The committee from the convention of the American Bankers' Association wanted a clause in the bill which would provide that interest should be paid on their reserves. The resolution, prepared by Mr. Hepburn, was as follows:

The provision that no interest is to be paid by the Federal reserve banks upon any deposits, except those of the United States and except such as the national banks may receive under the provision in connection with the division of earnings, whereby 40 per cent of the earnings in excess of 5 per cent to be paid them on their capital-stock investment, is to be paid to the member banks in proportion to their annual average balances with such Federal reserve banks, is most objectionable.

Of course it was objectionable to the bankers that the money which they were required to deposit with the Federal reserve bank should draw no interest when they had been getting 2 per cent interest from the banks of New York for such deposits. It was quite natural that they should object most strenuously; but when the bill was passed there was no provision that interest should be paid to banks on the deposit of their reserves with the Federal reserve bank. Was that "an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest"?

The Congress further determined that instead of allowing national banks 40 per cent of the earnings in excess of 5 per cent on their capital-stock investment the Federal reserve bank should not be made a profit-making concern; that a profit-making bank would of necessity pursue a policy of high rates of interest, in order to swell its dividends, to the detriment of the borrowing public. The Wilson administration, knowing that the national banks in the United States made on the average a profit of over 11 per cent per annum on their capital, and that the Bank of England and the Bank of France each made even greater profits, it was determined to increase the amount to be paid on the capital-stock investment to 6 per cent and to cut out entirely as dividends the 40 per cent of the earnings referred to in the bill. As the bill was enacted there can be no such thing as enormous profits accruing from the establishing of high rates of interest.

The salaries of the officers and employees of the Federal Reserve Board and Federal reserve banks, as well as the other expenses of the system, are not paid by the Government, but are paid from the receipts of the Federal reserve banks.

THE BANKERS WANTED THE CURRENCY TO BE ISSUED BY THE BANKS; THE ACT PROVIDES IT SHALL BE ISSUED BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Wall Street and the banking interest desired the currency to be issued by the banks and not by the Government. Nearly every banker who appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee tried to show that it was detrimental to the Government to issue currency, unless it was covered dollar for dollar by gold, and that it would be better for the Government to have the currency issued by the banks. The issuance of currency is the exercise of a governmental function; the quantity issued determines to a large extent the price of everything that money will buy. To vest that power exclusively in the hands of one or of a few banks would, therefore, subject the people of this country to an inflation or a contraction of the currency, dependent upon the will of the large moneyed interests. A bank currency can not, in the nature of things, be as sound and as safe from depreciation as currency issued by the Government, which has the taxable property of the entire Nation to uphold it.

The people want a currency concerning which there can be no question. The currency provided in this act has so many safeguards that it has been calculated the chances of loss to the Government in the issuance of each dollar do not exceed one in one quintillion times, and to the holder no chance whatever. No bank currency can possibly be so secured. The administration determined, therefore, that the currency issued should be the direct obligation of the Government, secured by prime commercial paper bearing the indorsement of a solvent maker, of a solvent acceptor, of a solvent member bank, and of a solvent Federal reserve bank. The contingency of the failure of each of these obligors within the same 90 days—the life of the commercial paper hypothecated—is so remote as to make it infinitesimal. When Congress refused the request of the bankers to make this a bank currency, was that "an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest"?

WALL STREET CONTENDED FOR THE ABSOLUTE RETIREMENT OF THE NATIONAL-BANK NOTES AND THE SUBSTITUTION OF THEIR 2 PER CENT BONDS BY 3 PER CENT BONDS, BUT WITHOUT AVAIL.

The bankers of Wall Street and the banking interest insisted upon an absolute retirement of the national-bank notes, and wanted the Government to issue 3 per cent bonds to take up the 2 per cent obligations securing bank circulation. To be sure, it would be to the interest of national banks to substitute their 2 per cent bonds now securing paper circulation with 3 per cent bonds of the United States. It would be equivalent to making a present of $7,000,000 a year to the banks, and if the 3 per cent bonds ran for 20 years, it would be equivalent to making a present to the banks of $140,000,000. The bankers wanted this retirement of the national-bank notes to take place within 20 years, an equal amount to be withdrawn each year. The effect of such retirement would be a contraction of currency to the extent of thirty-five to forty millions of dollars every year, unless the currency issued on the 90-day paper hypothecated would be perpetually renewed and remain in circulation. Of course such retirement would have a tendency to make money dearer, but it would be reflected in increased rates of interest upon all of the people in the country. Whenever money becomes scarce interest gets high. The act as passed gave to the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board the retiring of any of the national-bank notes, prohibiting, however, the retirement under any circumstances of more than $25,000,000 a year; it also provided that Federal reserve bank notes might be issued in lieu of the retired national-bank notes. The bankers were violently opposed to this provision. Was that "an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest"?

THE BANKERS URGED A HIGH MINIMUM GOLD RESERVE, BUT FAILED TO GET IT.

Wall Street and the banking interest wanted a gold reserve of 40 per cent of all notes issued under this system by the Government, and insisted that this reserve should never, in any event, be reduced below 33⅓ per cent. The requirement of a large minimum gold reserve has the effect of making a greater strain upon the gold of the world. The banks of the nations have a system of replenishing their gold reserves by increasing the rate of discount, that is, the rate of interest. Such action is exceedingly serious, because it controls the interest rate to all the borrowing public. The Bank of England, in order to get gold, raises the rate of discount, which produces a movement of credits to England, and thereby a flow of international money—gold—to settle balances. It is drawn from France, Germany, and other countries, and sometimes from the United States. France, to readjust the balance—to get back the gold which she has lost by reason of the Bank of England increasing the discount rate—must raise her rate a little higher, in order to attract money from England and other countries. Germany, finding her gold is being depleted by the increased rate of interest in France and England, must raise her rate of discount still higher, to recover the gold which she has lost. Thus this competitive bidding for the purpose of attracting gold results in enormous increases in the interest rates in all the countries of the world. Whatever raises the rate of interest in a country is directly to the advantage of the banks. Therefore it was not surprising that Wall Street wanted to have established as large a minimum gold reserve as possible, that the strain on the gold of the world would be increased, that the bidding for gold would not be checked, and that the rate of interest would continue to rise.

The act as passed provided for a maximum 40 per cent gold reserve, but with the power to reduce that reserve from 40 to 32½ per cent, simply upon the payment of not to exceed 1 per cent per annum additional interest by one desiring gold. Then, instead of having a 33⅓ per cent rigid minimum gold reserve, the act provides that it may be decreased below that point by the payment of a penalty of 1½ per cent increase of interest per annum upon every 2½ per cent decrease in the gold reserve. Thus, so long as the gold is in the Treasury of the United States, no man needing gold can be deprived of it, if he is willing to comply with the terms of the act as to security and as to the payment of the increased rate of interest. Was that "an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest"?

WALL STREET OBJECTED TO THE CURRENCY BEING REDEEMABLE AT THE FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS IN ANYTHING BUT GOLD.

Wall Street and the banking interest wanted the notes of the Government redeemable in gold alone, not only at the Treasury of the United States, but also at each of the Federal reserve banks. The direct effect of such requirement would have been to create the necessity for much larger redemption funds than if the notes had been redeemable in gold only at the Treasury. Redemption in gold alone at each Federal reserve bank would have created against the Government's needs 12 distinct competing points for the acquisition of gold, and much more gold than the minimum requirement would naturally have been held by each bank. The result of such a policy would have been to increase the strain upon gold with all the effects which I have just described. The banks were not successful, and no gold reserve is required to be kept in the banks for the purpose of redeeming the currency. But the banks are required to furnish the gold to the Treasury with which to meet all of the notes issued by the Government under this act. Under the law heretofore it was necessary for the National Government to maintain the gold reserve with which to redeem the greenbacks, and when such gold was acquired and it was drawn out by the banks the Government had to replenish the same by buying more gold; thus there was created what in 1893 was called an endless-chain demand upon the gold of the Treasury. There is no longer any danger of such an endless chain being worked on the Treasury, because the greenbacks are now of such small denominations and so scattered as to make it impracticable to gather them for redemption. There can be no endless chain against the Treasury as to the notes authorized by this act, because the Government would immediately notify the banks to make good any depletion of the gold reserve, and thus under this act we now have an endless chain against the banks instead of the banks having an endless chain against the Government. Was that "an abject surrender to Wall Street and the banking interest"? These instances of the refusal of their demands show conclusively that the passage of the banking and currency act was not a surrender to them, but was meant to be a curb upon Wall Street. The act was intended to create a sound banking system, to keep reserves near home, to stimulate commerce, to facilitate the means of financing new enterprises, to make the moneys of depositors safe, and to decrease the rates of interest to the people, with all the blessings that would flow therefrom.

Three great benefits will result from the passage of the banking and currency act:

First. The concentration and mobilization of reserves, which can be utilized when there is a stringency in the money market or when a panic is imminent, and thereby the money of the depositors made more secure.

Previous to the passage of this act most of the reserves of country banks were required to be kept in the 315 national banks of the 47 reserve cities of the Union. There are three central reserve cities, namely, New York, Chicago, and St. Louis, containing 52 national banks. The banks in the reserve cities were required to keep most of their reserves in the banks of these three central reserve cities. Under this act there is a concentration of these reserves from 367 banks in reserve and central reserve cities to 12 Federal reserve banks, situate in 12 different parts of the country, each of the Federal reserve banks having a prescribed territory for its business and each being required to look after the interests of and prevent runs upon the banks of its own district. These reserves, even if no other banks than the national banks come into the system, will amount to $450,000,000. The capital subscribed to the Federal reserve banks will be more than $100,000,000. The deposits by the United States Treasury in the Federal reserve banks will amount to $250,000,000. Thus there will be concentrated in these 12 Federal reserve banks about $800,000,000. With such a large fund from which to advance money to banks there will be a confidence instilled in their stability which will discourage withdrawals of deposits from the same and prevent runs upon all solvent banks, and with the strict inspection required by the provisions of this act there should hereafter be no such thing as a disastrous panic.

Second. The establishment of a discount market for commercial paper.

Heretofore there has been no market for such paper except that which could be established by applying to a bank with which a person might be accustomed to deal. But the difficulty of that situation has been that when there was a stringency in the money market it affected not only the country banks, where drafts would be discounted, but affected the very banks in the reserve cities and central reserve cities, which held the reserves of the country banks. The locking up of the money with which to redeem deposits in the country banks produced the same result in the reserve city banks and in the three central reserve city banks. Under this act a customer of a national bank can get his drafts discounted, because the national bank can, whenever it wants the money upon those drafts, guarantee the payment of the same and cash them at the Federal reserve bank. If in time of stress the Federal reserve bank pays out all the reserves, it can still get money with which to cash such drafts by depositing with the agent of the Federal Government the very drafts drawn by the customer of the national bank, which have been discounted by the Federal reserve bank, and by depositing the gold reserve required.

Thus a perfect discount market is created, and no bank need close its doors as long as it has good paper within its vaults, which it can discount at the Federal reserve bank. The creation of a discount market, therefore, will be of inestimable advantage to prevent runs upon banks and the disasters that result from panics, which not only affect the banks and the depositors of the banks, but also the value of all personal and real property in the country.

Third. The issuance of an elastic currency by the Government to meet the demands of commerce, as long as prime commercial paper, bearing the indorsement of the maker, the acceptor, the national bank, and the Federal reserve bank, together with the gold reserve, can be presented to the National Government.

Whenever there is a stringency in the money market the banks will forego the interest on their drafts in order to get money with which to meet the demands of their depositors, but whenever money is abundant the banks will no longer discount paper with the Federal reserve bank and thereby lose the interest which they gain by holding the paper of their customers. This produces an automatic regulation of the supply of the money of the country. It provides for the expansion and contraction of the currency according to the needs of commerce.

It is said that the losses to the people of the United States caused by the panic of 1907 were equal in amount to that which would result from the destruction of everything upon a strip of land 100 miles wide extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans. This panic was due to want of confidence, of unreasonable fear as to the stability of the banks, when they were perfectly solvent; and yet people had to sacrifice stocks, bonds, and other property in order to obtain money with which to meet their obligations. This legislation will prevent runs upon solvent banks, make the money of depositors secure, reduce the rates of interest to the people, and create an upward movement in commerce and industry.

The effect of the banking and currency act was felt in financial circles from the very day of its passage. It surely averted a panic which was then imminent. For a number of months the banks had been curtailing their loans and increasing their reserves so as to weather the threatening storm. Such action, instead of allaying the feeling of distrust, increased it. In fact, runs upon some banks in a number of cities had already begun. When the act was passed, which gave assurance of the policy to be pursued as to cashing commercial paper and supplying a currency to meet the needs of trade, almost instantly confidence in the banks to meet the demands of depositors was restored and money became easy. In a few weeks all appearance of panic disappeared, banks began increasing their loans instead of locking up their money, and thus the panic was averted. The relieving of the tight money market has been felt in lower rates of interest, which have affected the price of stocks and bonds. Of the stocks of 63 corporations quoted in the list of Henry Clews & Co., of New York City, all but those of 10 companies show an increase over their low prices of 1913. If, by reason of the anticipation of what will be accomplished by the banking act, such great results have been accomplished, how much greater will be the achievement when the $800,000,000 becomes available for the discount of commercial paper.

With, first, the centralization and mobilization of these great reserves; second, the establishment of a discount market for the cashing of all prime commercial paper; and, third, the creation of an elastic currency which automatically expands and contracts with the demands of commerce, this act will establish a financial policy which will produce innumerable benefits to the people and be recognized as one of the greatest constructive measures ever enacted by the Congress of the United States.

I now would be pleased to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator has taken a casual remark made by some Senator more than five months ago, when we were sitting here from 10 o'clock in the morning until 11 o'clock at night, because it was said to be absolutely necessary to pass a bank bill at once, as a medium for his remarks.

I am quite in agreement with the Senator that the passage of this bill was not a surrender to Wall Street or State Street or any other street or to any other interest. Therefore, as far as that is concerned, there need be no controversy.

But I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he suggests in beginning his remarks that it was the purpose of those who favored a single bank that that bank should be located in Wall Street or in New York City.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I said that the bankers of New York expected it to be located there.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think any banker expected it to be located in New York. It was not the purpose of the Monetary Commission that it should be located in New York, but in Washington, and I have never heard a word of testimony from anyone that a central bank should be located anywhere else than at the National Capital.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Of course, there was no reason for the discussion of that question, because the committee and also the Congress had before it a bill which provided for not less than 8 nor more than 12 banks; but they wanted 1 bank, and, that being the financial center, it would be the natural place to locate the 1 bank. It seems to me that that must have been in the mind of every banker of the United States.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it was not in the mind of any banker in the United States or anybody connected with banking legislation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. New York did get one and Washington did not get any.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator also reflects on bankers because they were opposed to the compulsory features of the bill, especially to Wall Street bankers, as he terms them. As a matter of fact, there were three New York City bankers who appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee. One of them, Mr. Vanderlip, president of the National City Bank, testified in favor of the compulsory feature and distinctly said that if we were going to adopt a bill similar to the one under consideration there was nothing else for us to do.

Another of the bankers who appeared from New York was Mr. Cannon, president of the Fourth National Bank, who distinctly testified in favor of the compulsory features of the bill. I do not remember Mr. Gilbert's testimony on that subject, if he offered any; but it can not be charged that Wall Street bankers or those located in the neighborhood of Wall Street opposed the compulsory feature, because they did not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I presume that the authoritative statement on the subject would be what the committee representing the American Bankers' Association presented to the Banking and Currency Committee as their idea and as their claim. They vociferated most strenuously against being forced into a system, and one person stated that they would contest it in the Supreme Court of the United States, and that even if the court held that it was not a violation of the fifth amendment of the Constitution, they would not enter the system under those circumstances. That represented the sentiment of this great American Bankers' Association. Individual banks, such as the Senator refers to, may have had a different idea. They may have had their views thereon modified after knowing the committee was going to report against the proposition which they had been contending for.

Mr. WEEKS. What the Senator says is true to this extent: The committee representing the American Bankers' Association appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate in the early days of the hearing. The bill had in the meantime been very greatly modified and changed, so that those who testified in the early days were considering a different proposition from the one finally before the committee. There was ample reason for taking the position which the bankers later in the hearing did take, and among them Mr. Vanderlip and Mr. Cannon.

Furthermore, I want to say that Mr. Vanderlip was one of those who advocated the rediscounting of paper by other reserve banks. He said that it would be necessary, if we were going to have more than one bank to compel a rediscounting for one bank by another in case of an emergency.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is likely true in the case of Mr. Vanderlip, but I am sure that a majority of the bankers protested against that.

Mr. WEEKS. They did in the earlier days of the hearing, but not in the later days of the hearing, when the bill had been so modified through the efforts of the Senator from Colorado and others that it looked as if we were really going to get a workable bill.

I simply inject these comments, because I know, as everybody knows, that Wall Street is a good term to conjure with when we want to appeal to the unthinking. As a matter of fact, Wall Street is not a loaner of money. Wall Street is a borrower of money. The Senator has suggested that Wall Street wanted to keep the rates up, because they could make more money by doing it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They pay 2 per cent interest on it and then lend it out at 6 per cent.

Mr. WEEKS. They borrow the money and want to keep the rate down. I simply call attention to the fact that the Senator mixes up the banks of New York and large centers with what is really Wall Street. He may condemn one in his mind, but he is condemning the other by his voice. He should discriminate between Wall Street as an exchange center and the banks represented by Mr. Vanderlip, Mr. Cannon, and others, who came here and materially assisted us in framing the bill which is now on the statute books.

Mr. SHAFROTH. To say that Wall Street is not a lender of money seems to me ridiculous. We know from the capitalization which they have in those banks, the amount of deposits that are made, and the amount of loans made there that they are the greatest lending institutions in the entire world.

It is true they borrow money, as every bank does; but they have a system by which they borrow at such a low rate and lend it out at such a good rate—I will not say high, because it is controlled by the supply and demand—that to say they are not lenders of money seems to me to be absurd.

Now, the Senator says that Wall Street is a good word to conjure with. I must say, Mr. President, that it was not my words that formed the subject of the discussion of this matter. The statement was made by a Senator on the floor of this Chamber, and in it he used the exact language I have quoted. It was my purpose and my object to show that from the proceedings which occurred before the Banking and Currency Committee it was not a surrender to Wall Street, and I hardly believe that any member of the committee so believes.

The Senator says that this was a casual remark of somebody made five months ago during the heated discussion of the banking and currency bill. That is a mistake. The fact is that it was delivered here upon the anniversary of the first year of the Wilson administration, three months after the banking and currency bill had been passed, and not only so, but it was a written speech, a speech made after due deliberation. Consequently it can not be said that it was the word of some person who in the heat of discussion uttered something which he really did not intend to say.

It seems to me these facts demonstrate—and I do not believe there is a member of the Banking and Currency Committee who will say otherwise—that this is a measure that has infinite good in it, and its passage was not a surrender under any circumstances to Wall Street or the banking interests. We believe that great good will result from its enactment.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the remarkable address which has just been delivered by the Senator from Colorado in a frantic effort apparently to convince himself that the currency bill was not a surrender to Wall Street, and in order to controvert that proposition he has quoted from the testimony criticisms that were made of a bill that was not passed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no.

Mr. BRISTOW. He has quoted the criticism of provisions in a bill that were cut out of it before it was passed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, Mr. President; I must say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It was delivered in March of this year, three months after the passage of the bill, and referred directly to the act, and not to the bill before its passage.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator misunderstands me. I said the Senator was quoting testimony that was given in criticism of the provisions of a bill, and that those provisions were not finally passed or incorporated in the law.

He refers to 10 per cent of the capital and 50 per cent of the reserve being impounded in this Federal reserve bank system, when the law makes no such provision. That is a criticism which the bankers made against the bill. The criticism which they made against these provisions of the bill do not apply to the law, because the provisions of the bill were changed so that 10 per cent of the capital is not required.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator concede that 10 per cent of the capital of the national banks is almost exactly the same as 6 per cent of the capital and surplus?—and that is the provision of the act. So there is hardly a variation of $1,000,000 in the amount which will be raised under the act as contrasted with the amount which was required by the 10 per cent provision.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then the Senator from Colorado refers with a great deal of approval to the fact that the law does not require bankers to be upon the board; but while the Senator praises the law because it does not provide that bankers shall be on the board, he neglects to refer to the fact that the board that has been selected, according to press dispatches, does contain bankers, and Wall Street bankers at that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; the provision of the law prescribes that no person shall be on the board while he is engaged in banking; in other words, that no person shall have a financial interest in a bank while he is acting as a member of the board. To deny the right to avail ourselves of his experience after a banker has withdrawn from a bank would be, it seems to me, unwise, and in the law the President has no qualification of that kind to restrict him in his selections.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator certainly does not contend that any banker ever appeared before the committee and advocated that a member of the board should be permitted to engage in the banking business at the same time he was a member of the board?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes, Mr. President. I not only do that, but I will quote the language of Mr. James B. Forgan, of Chicago, the president of the First National Bank of that city. He appeared before the committee and contended that the banking interests should have the privilege of themselves naming three of the Federal Reserve Board. I asked him the question in order to make it more definite as to whether or not the members of the board should be persons engaged in banking. Here is what I asked him:

Senator SHAFROTH. Mr. Forgan, the representation on the Federal Reserve Board which your convention has recommended, does it mean that persons representing that interest shall be engaged in banking?

Mr. FORGAN. Yes, sir; that it be left to the banks to appoint them; and, of course, they would be likely to appoint bankers from among themselves.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And you ask for three members upon the board?

Mr. FORGAN. Three; yes, sir.

That was the contention.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Colorado has put a construction upon that language that is not justified. What Mr. Forgan said was that the bankers, in his opinion, should be permitted to select members of this board, and that those members should be experienced bankers. Of course, to be "experienced bankers" they would have to be engaged in the banking business; but I make the statement now—I make it from memory, and there is a possibility that I may be mistaken, but I do not think I am—that you can not find in the testimony any statement from anyone claiming that any member of this board, while serving as a member of the board, should be engaged at the same time in the banking business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to assert that the proceedings before the committee were all voiced upon a representation of that kind, until it was shown by the presentation of authorities that no banker was permitted to act as a member of the governing board of the Bank of England or of the Bank of France. Then it was that the bankers receded to some extent in their contention in favor of having a person directly engaged in the banking business as a member of the board; but the statement of Mr. Wade and the testimony of Mr. Forgan show conclusively that they wanted the appointment of bankers, and wanted bankers upon the reserve board. It was only the reading of those statements showing what was the practice of the Bank of England and of the Bank of France that made some of those who testified say that they did not think that any person at the time connected with a bank should be a member of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. BRISTOW. I still make the assertion, basing it upon my memory of the testimony—and I challenge anyone to find any evidence in the testimony that will contradict it—that no one appeared before the committee who contended, and no member of the committee ever contended, that any member of that board ought to be actively engaged in the banking business while a member of the board.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that I do not think any member of the committee so contended. I think that no member of the committee took that position, but the bankers insisted that they should have representation, and they used the very language which I have quoted from Mr. Forgan. In reply to the direct question I addressed to him, with the books containing the declaration as to the practice of the Bank of England and of the Bank of France before me; notwithstanding that, he said that the bankers wanted three members on that board, and when asked whether they should be engaged in banking he said "yes"; that such men should be appointed.

Mr. BRISTOW. The banks contended that there should be experienced bankers on the board and that they ought to have a right to appoint them. The Senator's argument has been against the policy of placing bankers or men engaged in the banking business upon the board. That has been his contention in the address he has delivered here this morning, yet the very board whose names are to be presented to the Senate, if the press reports are true, contains bankers, men who are now in the banking business. What great merit does the Senator claim for this inhibition in the law when it has had no effect so far as the personnel of the board is concerned?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It has never been contended by anybody on the committee, so far as I know, that because one was a banker he could not act as a member of the Federal Reserve Board, provided he severed all connection either direct or indirect with the banking business. The incompatibility arises from the fact that he may have certain duties to perform as a member of the Federal Reserve Board which might become antagonistic to the position which he holds as a banker; for instance, the raising of the rate of interest. Of course it would be to the interest of the banker that an order should be made by the Federal Reserve Board increasing the rate of interest, as it would affect directly the revenues that would come to him in his bank; but it does not affect his revenues; it does not affect his interest if he is a member of the board and has severed his connection with the bank as a stockholder or as a director or as connected in any way with a bank. For that reason it never was intended to exclude people by reason of the fact that they had had banking experience.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is all the bankers are claiming. The bankers have, in the appointment of this board, secured all that they ever asked for; but the Senator from Colorado took the astounding position of praising the law because it did not permit bankers to select bankers for the board, and then commending the appointment of bankers upon the board, and probably at least one of the same bankers that the bankers themselves would have selected.

As to 6 per cent of the capital and surplus being equivalent to 10 per cent of the capital, if the bank does not happen to have a surplus it is not equivalent to 10 per cent.

Another very interesting observation of the Senator was that the gold reserve was required to be high in the bill which the Wall Street bankers proposed, and that it was reduced in the law. If I remember, the bankers who appeared before the committee thought there ought to be 40 per cent reserve, while 32½ per cent was the amount provided, was it not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; the bill as it passed provides for 40 per cent reserve under normal conditions, but permits the drawing down of that reserve to 32½ per cent simply upon the payment of a nominal interest, not more than 1 per cent per annum additional; it may be one-tenth of 1 per cent. Consequently, it is practically a 32½ per cent reserve in times of stress. Not only that, but the law provides that that can be reduced, as it should be and as the experience of the banks of Europe shows is advisable—that is, upon the payment of 1½ per cent per annum additional interest for every 2½ per cent decrease in reserve, the decrease can go to any amount. But when the reserve gets very low, instead of paying only 1 or 2 per cent the banker will have to pay 15 or 16 per cent interest, which he can not afford to do. Consequently, it makes the reserve act automatically, and the provisions of the law are in the interest of letting the gold out when it is needed by the public and of conserving it when it is not needed.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me ask the Senator if that very provision which was incorporated into the bill was not suggested by a banker at the committee hearings?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not remember that it was; but in any event the bill as it came from the House provided for a rigid reserve of 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And the bill as modified by the Senate is much better and more flexible, because it does provide for a reduction of the amount of the reserve upon the payment of a penalty, relying upon the self-interest of the banker not to draw gold unless he needs it in extreme cases, and, if he does need it, he ought to have it.

Mr. BRISTOW. That provision which I commend, and which the Senator commends, and which was certainly a very great improvement over the House provision, was suggested to the committee by the very bankers who appeared before it and whom the Senator has so ruthlessly criticized here this morning.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know by whom it was suggested; I do not remember; but I remember that the first draft of the matter was presented to me by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will refresh his memory of the hearings, he will find that my statement is true.

Then, the Senator stated that he thought that the passing of this law had averted a panic. That is something new to me. Why should the passing of this law not have prevented the exportation of gold also?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, the exportation of gold depends upon the rates of interest which are established. Any country can draw money away from America if it bids for it at a higher price, and that is unquestionably the cause at the present time and the reason for the exportation of gold.

Mr. BRISTOW. Now, let me ask the Senator, does not the exportation of gold depend very largely upon the balance of trade?

Mr. SHAFROTH. To some extent.

Mr. BRISTOW. Do we not have to settle with Europe in gold when we pay our debts, and do they not settle with us in gold when they pay theirs?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not necessarily; payment does not have to be in gold, but it may be in the sale of securities and in the increased sale of other things.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, it is in gold or commodities that are the equivalent of gold.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly; of course, the balances of trade have got to be settled.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; they have got to be settled, and the money that settles the differences in the balance of trade is gold.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not necessarily, because it affects the price of things as well. For instance, if there is a demand for gold in Europe and they need it, of necessity the result is that it affects the prices on the market there, and you will ship more cotton at a little less price, and that will supply the place of the gold that would be shipped, but there are certain times when there has to be gold shipped, when conditions are such that they do not need any more commodities.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then, the exchange of commodities is not a settlement?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly it is; but it all has relation to gold, to the quantity of gold, and to the bidding for gold.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the balance of trade is the difference between the amount which we send to Europe and the amount which Europe sends to us.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. We exchange commodities, of course, but the settling of the balances when they are settled, is in gold, is it not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not necessarily.

Mr. BRISTOW. How would the Senator balance it if it is not settled in gold?

Mr. SHAFROTH. By selling commodities at a lower rate.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is an exportation——

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is not a balance; that is the selling of goods.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Take the amount of the balance of trade in favor of the United States up to the 30th day of June, and it will be at least $550,000,000. Does Europe send us $550,000,000? No; she does not. We nearly always have a balance of trade in our favor. We have a large balance of trade right now in our favor.

Mr. BRISTOW. We have? I have not been so advised.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I mean from year to year, from the 30th of June to the 30th of June.

Mr. BRISTOW. But at the present time the Senator is not claiming that we have any balance of trade in our favor, is he?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; every month will show it, although it may not be as great a balance of trade as it was for the corresponding month of the previous year; but that we have a large balance of trade in our favor there is no question. I saw a statement the other day that the balance of trade to June 30, 1914, would be over $600,000,000. The fiscal year is nearly completed now, and it can be estimated almost exactly; the Treasury has figures now for 10 months, and it is easy to estimate what the other two months will be.

Mr. BRISTOW. How does the Senator account for the shipment of gold to Europe going on now?

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are a number of things that enter into the question of trade. Of course, we have the sale of commodities, and we take cognizance of that; but we do not take cognizance of the number of securities which are sold to Europe; we do not take cognizance of the amount of money that is spent by Americans who go to Europe, and counteract that balance of trade to a large extent. There are so many factors that enter into it that it is very difficult to separate them and give to each its proper effect; but when the bankers of Europe want gold the principal method which they employ is to increase the rate of interest; and as they increase the rate of interest, the effect is simply this: Securities can be bought over there at a higher price; in other words, a man who has got money in other countries will naturally go to the market that pays the best interest and the rate of interest which they establish causes credits to flow to that country. Sometimes, for a while, they will be set off one against the other in credits; but sooner or later the end will come when there must be a settlement, and that settlement must be made in gold. The shipment of gold, I think, for the last 30 days has been about $11,000,000.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is an interesting observation of the Senator that when they raise the bank rate they raise the price of securities. I thought that decreased prices.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They do decrease prices when they raise the rate; and consequently persons who have money buy the securities cheaper. That is the reason they send the money over to Europe for that purpose.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator evidently, then, made a mistake in stating that raising the interest rate increased prices.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I misspoke if I said that the raising of the rate increased prices of stocks and bonds.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the Senator has not yet stated why there is an exportation of gold going on from this country now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The bank rate of England has been raised. That is the reason; the bank rate is higher, and consequently investors are willing to send their money to buy stocks and bonds which fall as interest rates increase, or to lend their money over there.

Mr. BRISTOW. How much was the bank rate of England raised, and when?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know; but there was a table which I had at the time of the passage of the act which showed——

Mr. BRISTOW. Has it been raised recently?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Which showed that in 1898 the bank rate of England was 2 and 2½ per cent, while at the time we were engaged in a discussion in this body of the banking and currency bill, in November, 1913, it was 5 and 5½ per cent, caused by the Bank of England, the Bank of France, and the Bank of Germany raising the rate of discount in order to get a flow of gold to them, and then each one raising against the other the rate in order to draw back the gold which they had lost.

Mr. BRISTOW. Has the Bank of France or the Bank of Germany or the Bank of England increased the rate on gold recently; and if so, to what amount?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know. I have not looked at the bank quotations.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then the Senator does not know that the increased rate that the banks of Europe will pay for gold is attracting our gold to Europe?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I know that is the natural way of doing it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; but I was trying to find out the Senator's view as to why we were shipping and exporting practically every day now large quantities of gold to Europe.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, I think that there must be a better demand over there for money than there is here.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is it not a matter of fact that it may be that the rate has gone down here instead of the rate over there increasing? That would attract it in the same way. Is it not also a fact that in the month of April there was a very large balance of trade against us?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think there was a balance against us. There was a less balance in our favor than there had been for the corresponding month of the year before, but not a balance against us.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is mistaken about that. There was a large balance against us in the month of April. That is why the gold is going out now; it is perfectly simple.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is possible that that may be so; but at the same time my impression is that there is not a balance against us. I think that if you will look at the figures you will find that, while there has been a decrease in the balance of trade in our favor with the corresponding month of a year ago, yet there is not a balance of trade against us at the present time.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator has not yet explained how the passage of this bill averted the panic to which he was referring.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will try to explain that to the Senator. It made money easy. It established confidence immediately. The banks knew that the policy of the United States was to have lower reserves, and that would permit the banks to lend out money and relieve the demands which were made upon them for money, which they had been declining to supply. They had been hoarding money for the purpose of weathering the storm; and when they found that the policy of the Government was going to be in favor of lower reserves, it had a tendency to make them let go, to let their money out. That relieved the demand which was made upon them for money, and that very thing prevented runs.

We know, as a matter of fact, that banks in various portions of the United States had runs upon them. That was the condition, and the fear of the people was getting so that it was predicted that we would have a panic. You do not hear any such statements now. We do not hear of any conditions of that kind. There is a certain amount of relief in confidence. If depositors know that their money is going to be forthcoming; if they know that a liberal policy is to be pursued, that a bank policy is to be inaugurated in the United States by which banks can cash their commercial paper to any extent, of course the demand by depositors for their money is not going to be so persistent. It is not going to be prompted by fear that the depositors might lose it, because if a bank has commercial paper—and it nearly always has; every solvent bank has enough commercial paper to supply the demand of the depositors—you can readily see that the demand growing out of fear would immediately cease. That element has been removed; and for that reason the confidence which has been brought about by the passage of this bill has instilled in the people a knowledge of the fact that they can get relief. That being the case, it has stopped runs.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, it is very interesting to me, and somewhat amusing, for the Senator to argue that a law which has not yet become effective, under which no banks have been organized, under the provisions of which not a dollar of currency has been issued and will not be for months, has averted a panic that would have occurred months ago. That, to me, seems amusing instead of convincing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that in almost all instances stocks and bonds have gone up on the New York market?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the Senator had better read the quotations before he speaks of the advance in stocks and bonds.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir; I have a price list of the New York Stock Exchange which shows that in the case of all but 10 companies there has been an increase in the price of the stocks as contrasted with the low price of the year 1913. Why is that? It is due to the same cause; to the fact that whenever money is easy, as they term it, there comes a lower price. People begin to bid for lower rates of interest, and that, of course, has an influence in the direction of increasing the price of stocks and increasing the price of bonds. That is what the effect has been upon the New York market. It is not so pronounced as it will be when we get the $800,000,000 in the reserves and ready to lend out to the banks whenever they feel that they need it. Under those circumstances you will find that the upward tendency will be much stronger.

Mr. BRISTOW. What about Government bonds? Does the Senator think the price of Government bonds has been increased by the passage of this bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It has not been decreased, and I think there has been a little increase in the price of Government bonds.

Mr. BRISTOW. Since when?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Since the passage of the banking and currency act.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, I will admit that when the country was threatened with the abortion that came over here from the House it had a very disastrous effect upon the credit of the United States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thought the Senator said it was impossible for an act which had not been passed to have any disastrous effect or to have any beneficial effect.

Mr. BRISTOW. Why, no; I never said that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; the Senator said he could not conceive that the contention I made was true, that the mere passage of the act before the reserve banks came into operation would have any effect in the direction of averting a panic; yet he is reciting something that is in line with my statement.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; the Senator probably misunderstood my position. Before this legislation was threatened the country was in a very normal and prosperous condition, and United States 2 per cent bonds were selling at a premium. After it was announced that there would be currency legislation, and the character of the legislation that was proposed was demonstrated by the passage of the bill by the House, it had a very disastrous effect upon the credit of the United States, and our 2 per cent bonds went down to 96, as I remember.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think that is right. They are more than 96 now, however.

Mr. BRISTOW. They are 97 now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Probably 97½ or 98.

Mr. BRISTOW. They are not above par, as they were before the enactment of the legislation which the Senator is praising.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They have not been at par for a considerable number of months.

Mr. BRISTOW. Not since this administration determined to write a new currency law have the United States 2 per cent bonds been at par.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No, sir; even before that they went down below par; but, of course, to a certain extent, that is determined by the demand for money and the demand for securities. For some time, and I do not know but that it had been for two years, the 2 per cent bonds had been below par; but since the passage of the act there is no question but that there has been an upward tendency in all the bonds of the United States.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to have the Senator, if he will, take the time to investigate and put in the RECORD the dates when United States bonds were below par prior to a year ago, the 4th of March.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I shall be glad to do it.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator will find, if I remember correctly, that for more than 20 years they had not been below par. I do not think they had been below par since a former Democratic administration, although I may be mistaken as to that; and they have gone up one-half of 1 per cent, I believe, since the law was finally passed. I am speaking of the 2 per cent bonds, of course.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They are more than 96½ now. The Senator surely can not contend that that is not true.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; they are 97 now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They went down to 96.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to insist that hereafter Senators shall address the Chair before interrupting.

Mr. BRISTOW. There has been handed to me a financial statement from which I will read in regard to the balance of trade:

> Gold exports have been renewed on a liberal scale, and seem likely to continue for some time to come. The April statement of foreign commerce was anything but satisfactory, and showed a striking change of tendency. Our exports were $162,000,000, or $37,500,000 less than a year ago——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. Just a moment, until I get through.

Mr. REED. I only ask the Senator to yield for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Just a moment, until I get through reading this:

> While imports in the same month were $27,000,000 higher than the previous year. This turned an excess of exports in April, 1913, of $53,600,000 into an excess of imports in April, 1914, of $10,200,000. There was thus a violent shift of $63,800,000 in our trade balance within a single month. Usually we have an excess of exports, and it will be of interest to watch how long this change continues.

Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I merely wanted to ask the Senator what he was reading from.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am reading from a statement that was handed to me, issued by the banking house of Henry Clews & Co.

Mr. REED. Of No. 16 Wall Street?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not know what the number is; but I desire to say that Wall Street seems to be very happy over this banking bill.

Mr. LIPPITT. Those are the Government statistics.

Mr. LODGE. Those are the Government figures. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. REED. Henry Clews is rather good authority, but I am surprised that the Senator from Kansas would defile his tongue by quoting from anybody who had ever been on Wall Street.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. LODGE. Those are the Government figures, taken from the Government reports. They were all put in here by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] the other day.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Missouri seems to be shocked that I should quote somebody from Wall Street. I have not any objection to quoting anybody from Wall Street. I think the Senator is probably quite as friendly to Wall Street as I am, because he supported a currency bill which is very satisfactory to Wall Stret, while I had the pleasure of voting against it.

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President; I supported a bill which was opposed by about 90 per cent of the Wall Street people, and which has been generally accepted by the country, while the Senator from Kansas floundered around for some months and never lit anywhere.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think the Senator from Kansas has floundered on any proposition any more than the Senator from Missouri did on the Currency Committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is a horrible indictment to bring against a man, because it is only a few months since we were specifically interrogating the Senator from Kansas as to what party he belonged to, and he could not tell us whether he was a Republican, a Progressive, or whether he was just off in a flock by himself. He absolutely stood mum. He invoked his constitutional rights and refused to incriminate himself.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Kansas always answers questions when he desires to do so. He has never been at sea as to where he stood on anything. He reserves to himself the right to answer or to refuse to answer any question that may be asked him.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator is always ready to answer when it is fortunate for him to answer; but being in that unhappy condition when he wanted the votes of both the Republicans and the Progressives, and was uncertain in which camp to alight in order to get the most votes, he invoked his privilege of refusing to answer at all.

Mr. BRISTOW. I would not want the parallel to be drawn, because it would not be pertinent; but if the Senator from Kansas should be as successful in this alleged hesitation as to his political alliances as the Senator from Missouri was when he got two regional banks for his State out of the law which he finally supported after much tribulation and travail, the Senator from Kansas would be eminently successful.

Mr. REED. Why, Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will follow my course diligently he will be able to achieve success once in a while in the State of Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. That may be true. I do not care to take any more of the time of the Senate on these personal matters while we are considering the tolls bill.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it not true that during the first year of the operation of the Payne-Aldrich law similar situations existed in separate months with reference to a change in the amount of exports and imports?

Mr. BRISTOW. That is a matter with which I am not familiar. I have not looked it up.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Before the Senator yields the floor I should like to call his attention to this very tabulation which is made by Henry Clews & Co.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to call the Senator's attention, on the line of the increased price of stocks at present over the low price of 1913, to the following:

Amalgamated Copper: Present price, 72⅜; low price of 1913, 61⅝; an increase of 11 per cent.

American Car & Foundry, common: Present price, 50⅛; low price of 1913, 36½; an increase of nearly 14 per cent.

American Car & Foundry, preferred: Present price, 118; low price of 1913, 108; an increase of 10 per cent.

The next is American Locomotive, common: Present price, 33; low price of 1913, 27; an increase of 6 per cent.

American Locomotive, preferred: Present price, 98⅝; low price of 1913, 94; an increase of 4⅝ per cent.

Take the price of the common stock of the American Smelting & Refining Co.: Present price, 64; low price of 1913, 58½; an increase of 5½ per cent.

American Smelting & Refining, preferred: Present price, 100⅝; low price of 1913, 97; an increase of 3⅝ per cent.

Mr. BRISTOW. Has the Senator there the quotations for 1912, also?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No. Nearly all of these figures run that way.

Mr. BRISTOW. Those are the low prices?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; those are the low prices.

Mr. BRISTOW. The high prices are not quoted; but a proper comparison would be with the quotations of 1912 instead of those of 1913, as the Senator must admit. The comparison he makes is against himself when he compares 1913 and 1914.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It shows that more money has been let loose; consequently, interest is lower, and consequently stocks and bonds are rising a little, though not very much; but when this law gets into operation the rise will be very great.

Mr. BRISTOW. But a comparison between 1914 or 1913 and 1912 would be a better comparison, so far as comparing the two systems is concerned.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; because the bill was passed on the 23d day of December, 1913, and therefore it is fair to take the quotations for the year 1913 and compare them with the quotations for 1914.

Mr. BRISTOW. That was in prospect of the new system, and not the established condition under the old system.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the canal tolls bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 14385.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I had once thought to content myself with no further expression on this issue than such as would be found in my vote for the repeal of that clause of the Panama Canal act which exempts our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls.

But as I have listened to the debate and have observed the force and apparent earnestness of the opponents of repeal as well as the ability and the skill with which they have marshaled facts and arguments, I have felt more and more impelled to avail myself of the opportunity before the vote is taken to state my own humble views as to the meaning of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—views held from the first, but confirmed and strengthened by such thought and study as I have been able to give the subject since it has been under discussion here.

It is worthy of note that the President of the United States some weeks prior to March 5, 1914, had determined to recommend to Congress the repeal of the clause in controversy, and that on that date he appeared before the joint assembly of the House and Senate, and in perhaps the shortest message ever delivered to Congress, barring, of course, the message used for the transmittal of some report or document, said among other things:

I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

Contrasting the message with others, he informed us that no communication he had theretofore addressed to the Congress "carried with it graver or more far-reaching implications as to the interest of the country."

In that message the President pleaded only the ultimate facts; he did not "anticipate the defense" and did not seek to confess and avoid the clear declaration of the platform of his party upon the subject—a declaration, it would seem, more or less potent in determining the attitude of leading members of the President's party in both the House and Senate. Nay, more, the message vouchsafed no word of explanation of the President's changed attitude in regard to that plank of the platform which favored "the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in the coastwise trade passing through the canal," and which the President himself had emphasized and indorsed during the campaign.

We can not, however, ignore the importance, not to say seriousness, of the President's message. To these his disregard of the platform declaration and his own previous personal view but give new emphasis. They serve, moreover, to convince me that whether the President and those who agree with him are right or not, the motives which influence him in urging this repeal are patriotic and can not be impugned.

One ground of repeal urged by the President was that the law is in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Most of what I have to say will be confined to that phase of the subject.

In considering the effect of the language of an international treaty, may we not turn to the courts for a guide? They have laid down rules for the construction of statutes and constitutions. It can not be irrelevant to refer to some of them, for I assume that the rule for the construction of the language of a statute must in the main be the rule for the construction of a treaty, which is the supreme law of the land.

In construing the terms of this treaty we may consider, first, the import of the words themselves; second, the object sought to be accomplished by the treaty; third, if yet there be doubt, then resort may be had to historical investigation for the purpose of clearing away the obscurity created by the language of the treaty.

I invoke a rule laid down many years ago in a great case by a great Chief Justice. It is a rule applicable whether the construction of the language of a constitution, a treaty, or a statute is sought to be made narrow and restricted on the one hand, or liberal and enlarged on the other. It is the rule which would neither extend nor limit words "beyond their natural and obvious import." In exemplifying this rule Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbons against Ogden, says:

As men whose intentions require no concealment generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed our Constitution, and the people who adopted it, must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said. If, from the imperfection of human language, there should be serious doubts respecting the extent of any given power, it is a well-settled rule that the objects for which it was given, especially when those objects are expressed in the instrument itself, should have great influence in the construction. We know of no reason for excluding this rule from the present case—we know of no rule for construing the extent of such powers other than is given by the language of the instrument which confers them, taken in connection with the purposes for which they were conferred.

There is the rule, a rule of reason and of common sense. It is the touchstone before which every effort to construe the words to fit some particular theory or exigency must give way. No diplomatic legerdemain, no casuistry will prevail against it. The enforcement of this rule of construction of statutes and constitutions has brought punishment to the guilty, has protected the weak against the unscrupulous strong, and has held the individual and the corporation to the fulfillment of obligations they would have evaded. It is the cardinal rule of construction which, applied by the courts to statutes, both State and Federal, has set at naught the play upon words and the technical and overrefined distinctions which would have avoided their true intent and force. The words used by the high contracting parties in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty seem on their face plain enough.

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Is not the United States one of "all nations"? Is it not one of "all nations observing these rules"? What is the natural and obvious import of the words? Of course we are not limited to the words of a sentence or paragraph for an understanding of its meaning, but to ascertain such meaning may consider the words of the entire treaty. But taking the words of this first rule, their perusal hardly suggests a necessity for resort to extraneous facts, nor a further study of the object sought to be accomplished by the treaty; nor that we must seek the interpretation of diplomats or international lawyers; nor in fact resort to any of the aids which the law permits when the terms of a statute are of doubtful meaning.

Whatever the suggestions or influences which may lead to more critical study or to perhaps a different judgment, I submit that to the impartial and reasonably intelligent mind, knowing the United States to be a party to that agreement, the words are not ambiguous; their fair import is that the United States is included among the nations observing the rules and is bound by them.

To such a mind it will be far from 'evident' that the language of article 3, relating to the adoption of rules for the neutralization of the canal, relieves the United States from their observance, for by this language the United States does not undertake to prescribe rules for the neutralization of the canal. In the language of the article, she "adopts" them—accepts, receives, makes them her own. Moreover, the adoption of the rules is not by her own original declaration or on her own initiative. It is her solemn engagement with Great Britain. Considering the end to be reached as it appears on the face of the treaty, it would not have been an unreasonable construction to say that if the United States had agreed to "prescribe" the six rules set forth in the treaty instead of to "adopt" them the fair intendment would have been that she did in fact adopt them for the purpose of observing them herself and requiring their observance by every other nation using the canal for its vessels of commerce and of war.

Now, what is the object sought to be accomplished by article 3 as appears upon the face of the instrument from the words employed? The purpose of this article is the great feature of the treaty. It has given rise to all this controversy. Aside from article 3 there is the simple agreement that the treaty shall supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the United States in either one of three mentioned ways. And that is all; for it must be remembered that the "rights incident to such construction" and "the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal," conferred by article 2, are made "subject to the provisions of the present treaty." That is, they are made subject to the provisions of article 3, which contains these much-debated rules, the expressed object of which is the neutralization of the canal.

Mr. President, what must have been the mutual understanding, for there were two parties to this agreement superseding the 50-year-old Clayton-Bulwer convention, just as there were two parties to that? Did the minds of the parties meet and agree upon a proposition which would exempt the United States from the observance of the rules framed for the evident purpose of securing the peace and safety of this canal in time of war and the free and equal treatment of the ships and commerce of all the nations using it? Did Great Britain knowingly consent to such exemption?

Mr. President, there is a strange inconsistency in some of the arguments opposed to repeal—rather, perhaps, an inconsistency of attitude than of argument. For, according to the views of some Senators as expressed in this debate, the course of Great Britain, especially in her dealings with the United States, has been one of perfidy and cunning; it has even been declared that she never made an important treaty with the United States but that she afterwards violated it; that she invariably seeks her own advantage and the advantage of her citizens and subjects to the detriment of other nations. And yet, according to the interpretation put upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by these selfsame Senators in asserting our rights under it, we find Great Britain in making it was so lavish of good will toward the United States and had such a burning desire to further our ambitions and our commercial welfare that while pretending to secure the neutralization of the canal and free and equal terms for all, she meant that the United States should have for her commerce the advantage over all, including, of course, Great Britain herself.

Which horn of this dilemma will you take? That she actually did get the treaty she intended, with stipulations to our disadvantage as usual, or that departing from her customary tortuous methods and selfish purposes she generously conceded everything to the Nation against which it is her habit to commit wrong.

If the former theory is to prevail, it still is a treaty, and though its provisions may be burdensome, national honor would dictate that we abide by it until it is honorably modified or abrogated.

If, however, you hold to the view that Great Britain intended this great advantage should accrue to the United States at the time the treaty was signed by the plenipotentiaries, you assume a mighty burden in the attempt to prove her faithlessness, and that her present construction is a repudiation of her then voluntary act to the contrary. There is positively no evidence to convict Great Britain of duplicity in this regard. She declares now she never consented to the exemption of American coastwise trade from toll payments. She promptly declared it through her chargé de affaires, Mr. Innes, in July, 1912, while the proposed exemption was under discussion in the Congress, in his note to our Secretary of State. She declared it through her Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Sir Edward Grey, in his lengthy note to Ambassador Bryce, presented, as it was, to Mr. Knox, our Secretary of State. And England's claim is more than corroborated; it is established out of the mouths of our own witnesses, the negotiators of the treaty themselves. Mr. White, secretary of the embassy, in his testimony before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, found on page 131 of the hearings, wherein he narrates his interview with Lord Salisbury, describes Lord Salisbury as saying:

> I think that in due course of time we shall consent to the abrogation of such parts of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as stand in the way of your building the canal, subject, however, to one condition on which we lay great stress, namely, that the ships of all nations shall use the canal or go through the canal—

I think he said—

> on equal terms.

This conversation was in December, 1898.

It is inconceivable that Lord Salisbury at that time could have entertained the view that the United States was not to be one of the "all nations," subject to the provisions of any treaty which might be made.

Again, Mr. White says on page 132 of the hearings:

> During the entire period of those negotiations and in all my conversations with Lord Salisbury or with anyone else on either side of the Atlantic, I never heard the subject of our coastwise traffic mentioned. It was always assumed by those carrying on the negotiations—it certainly was by me in my interview with Lord Salisbury—that he meant that our ships should be considered, or, rather, that the United States should be considered as included in the term "all nations."

Mr. White further testifies that never, from beginning to end, had he any suggestions from any direction that our coastwise ships should be treated differently from other ships; that it was considered by him—and that he knew it was by Mr. Choate and by Lord Salisbury, because that seemed to be the point made by him—that all ships were to be treated in the same way.

Ambassador Choate himself in his letter of April 13 last, transmitting to the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] the diplomatic correspondence, has this to say:

> These, if carefully perused, will, I think, be found to confirm my view that the clause in the Panama Canal act exempting our coastwise shipping from tolls is a clear violation of the treaty.

I said that the expressed object of the six rules was the neutralization of the canal. It has been argued here with great force and skill that since "neutralization" applies to a condition of war with its belligerents on the one hand and with the places, persons, or things which by treaty or rules of international law are "neutralized" or rendered immune from hostilities, on the other hand, that therefore the first paragraph of article 3 following the introductory clause, and which provides that—

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination—and so forth, has nothing whatever to do with "neutralization." But that is not what the treaty says. I am considering the natural and obvious import of the words. It is a bold leap to the conclusion that the negotiators of this treaty, after two years of study upon this introductory clause and the rules following, did not mean what they said when among the specific rules to be adopted as a basis for the neutralization of the canal they framed the one providing for the free and equal use of the canal on terms of entire equality, and named it rule 1. Whatever, then, may have been the use and meaning of "neutralization" in international law or other international treaties, or granting that always theretofore it had applied to a state of war, it was here in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in terms given a more extended meaning, and made to apply to and embrace equality of treatment. This conclusion would seem to flow irresistibly from the words, the phraseology, and the arrangement and numbering of the rules. But we are not limited to the text. There are other sources of enlightenment.

The six rules adopted are substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal. I turn to that convention. I find several references for the free use of the canal. But article 12 is more than that. It may be called the counterpart of our rule 1 in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and is as follows:

> The high contracting parties, by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal, a principle which forms one of the bases of the present treaty, agree that none of them shall endeavor to obtain with respect to the canal territorial or commercial advantages or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded. Moreover, the rights of Turkey as the territorial power are reserved.

But this is not quite all. Considering the international interest in and knowledge of the subject, Sir Edward Grey would hardly have dared assert equality of treatment as the basis of the Suez Canal convention unless it had been so understood by the high contracting powers. In his note of November 14, 1912, to Ambassador Bryce, he says:

> His Majesty's Government regard equality of all nations as the fundamental principle underlying the treaty of 1901 in the same way that it was the basis of the Suez Canal of 1888.

Further in that same note he says:

> It certainly was not the intention of His Majesty's Government that any responsibility for the protection of the canal should attach to them in the future. Neutralization must therefore refer to the system of equal rights.

There is, of course, the other evidence furnished by the reference in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the principle of neutralization contained in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and such principle is not to be impaired by the present treaty; but article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty contains no reference whatever to the rights or obligations of the parties in case of war or hostilities. It is understood by the United States and Great Britain that in granting the joint protection to any canals or railways specified in the article—> that the parties constructing the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

So it is evident that equality of treatment is the general principle of neutralization referred to in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

And, according to Sir Edward Grey, "it was upon that footing and upon that footing alone that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded."

I desire to call special attention to this: Undoubtedly Mr. John Bassett Moore, who is among the greatest if not at the head of the authorities on international law, had the Suez Canal convention and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, if not others, in mind when he said in his article, reprinted from the New York Times, March 4, 1900, that—

> Equality of tolls has also been treated as a feature, or, perhaps, rather as a condition, of neutralization. Little need be said on this subject, since a discriminative policy, even if it did not lead to the immediate building of another canal, would merely provoke retaliation in some other form and prove in the end to be impracticable.

So, Mr. President, it is not 'evident' that the first paragraph is not one of the rules contemplated by the introductory clause of article 3. The law and the evidence are all the other way. The words of the treaty, the object sought, history, and authority on international law lead inevitably to the conclusion that "neutralization" as used and understood in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty included as its prime feature and object the equality of tolls as provided in rule 1.

In seeking an interpretation of this treaty consistent with the right to exempt our coastwise vessels resort has been had to words spoken in debate; to the opinions or testimony of individual Senators expressed at the time or afterwards. It is urged that when the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under discussion in December, 1900, the views expressed by some Senators when the Bard amendment was offered should have weight in determining the meaning of the treaty finally adopted.

That amendment reserving to the United States "the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect of the charges of traffic in favor of vessels of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade," was defeated by a vote of 47 to 23. For what was said we are dependent on the recollections of Senators who were present. To what extent Senators were influenced by the argument or explanation of any Senator is altogether uncertain. The admission of such evidence in court for the purpose of determining the disputed meaning of a statute, State or Federal, would not be tolerated. A treaty is a law, the supreme law of the land. I know of no rule which will admit the interpretation of the meaning of a treaty by the statement of a Senator as to what was said in debate upon the treaty and not admit his statement as to what was said by himself or a fellow Member in the discussion upon any bill which later became a law. As applicable to a statute the Supreme Court of the United States in the Trans-Missouri Freight Association case (166 U. S., 290) uses this language:

> There is, too, a general acquiescence in the doctrine that the debates in Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body. The reason is that it is impossible to determine with certainty what construction was put upon an act by the members of a legislative body that passed it by resorting to the speeches of individual members thereof. Those who did not speak may not have agreed with those who did; and those who spoke might differ from each other; the result being that the only proper way to construe a legislative act is from the language used in the act, and, upon occasion, by a resort to the history of the times when it was passed.

As the words spoken in debate are not admissible in a court of justice for the purpose of showing what was intended or meant by an act, so the testimony or opinions of individual Members are not admissible for such purpose.

There can be no better statement of the principle and the reason for it, all in one, than that by the court in the case of Richmond v. Supervisors (83 Va., 204):

> The intention of the draftsman of the act or of the individual members who voted for and passed it, if not properly expressed in the act, it is admitted has nothing to do with the construction. The only just rule of construction, especially among a free people, is the meaning of the law as expressed to those to whom it is prescribed and who are to be governed by it.

And so here; although Senators may in all sincerity bring forward for what weight they may have the opinions of Members to show intention other than the words of the treaty import, we must inevitably come back to that just rule of construction, namely, the meaning of the law as expressed to those to whom it is prescribed. The treaty was between the United States and Great Britain, but the canal will be used by every nation having foreign commerce. It is not improper to say the treaty is prescribed to the nations of the world, and the world is against our construction of the treaty as expressed in the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act.

The reason other nations have not made formal protest may be found in the fact that they are not parties to the treaty. And I may misjudge sentiment, I may not understand it, but let me pause to observe that so far as the treaty is a law prescribed to a free American people I feel satisfied the meaning of the law as expressed to the overwhelming majority is just as the high contracting powers declared:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations * * * on terms of entire equality.

They who framed the treaty and all for whom it was framed must, in the language of Marshall—> be understood to have employed words in their natural sense and to have intended what they have said.

There is for the Bard amendment incident a proper and legitimate use.

The amendment declared for a policy—the very policy enacted into law in 1912, the policy of discrimination in favor of the coastwise trade. The amendment was clear and specific in its terms. The fact that it was offered is proof of the author's interpretation of the treaty without the amendment or proof, at least, of his fear of it without the amendment. It was rejected, and from its rejection comes the presumption that the Senate was not then in favor of a policy of discrimination. This is the legitimate use of the circumstances attending the Bard amendment, and for this purpose and this legitimate conclusion we may consult the only record which the removal of the injunction of secrecy upon the Senate proceedings will give us. In any event, whatever may have been the understanding of some, I know of no evidence which shows that the treaty did not express the understanding of the requisite majority of the Senators at that time, namely, that all nations should, without discrimination, have the right to the free and equal use of the canal.

Mr. President, in view of the meaning and purpose of this treaty as disclosed by its terms and by the circumstances attending its execution it seems hardly necessary to seek further confirmation for the views here advanced. But there is the evidence of history, showing our attitude and purposes concerning this great enterprise. The evidence is cumulative; it gathers force as it goes. When Mr. Clay in 1826 instructed the American delegates to the Panama Congress—> that the benefits of it [the canal] ought not to be exclusively appropriated by any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls—it was not quite as much as to say that the canal should be open on terms of entire equality to the vessels of all nations and that there should be no discrimination. But the subject, from a national standpoint, was new, and this was the first authoritative declaration of the attitude of the United States concerning it. Mr. Clay, considering the time and the circumstances, could hardly have been more specific, and yet, broad-visioned statesman that he was, he used the language indicating the purpose to adopt a broad and liberal policy respecting the use and control of the canal toward the other nations of the world. It was a declaration which foreshadowed every subsequent official or diplomatic act or treaty of the United States in regard to the enterprise, whether consummated or only proposed, and every act or resolution of Congress down to and excepting only the act of 1912.

It may be granted that we were sometimes impelled by other motives than mere generosity in these earlier manifestations of our policy in regard to the canal. We knew the advantages and the attractiveness of such an enterprise to the other commercial nations of the world, some of them more powerful than we ourselves, perhaps. We knew our inability to then build it alone, and that it would be most difficult to find in all America the capital necessary for so vast an undertaking; and when a Dutch company, under the patronage of the King of Holland, in 1830 had secured the necessary concessions and was apparently about to begin the work of construction, our fears were aroused, and we then, at that early day, were vigorous in the assertion of our right—not to control, but merely to enjoy equal privileges in the use of the canal. To this end the demand was made that American citizens and even the Government itself should be permitted to subscribe to the stock of the canal company. The enterprise of the Dutch company was a failure, but it proceeded far enough to arouse apprehension that some foreign power might monopolize this great water highway, and thus from claiming a right to an equal privilege for ourselves when we were without the power to do more, we unreservedly adopted the policy of favoring equal privileges to all and have again and again proclaimed it to the world.

Have we not passed the day when might makes right in the intercourse of nations? Is it to be left to the United States to first claim an equal privilege, then proclaim it, then deny it because she has the power?

The Senate of the United States in 1835 was more specific in its declaration of the purpose of this Government toward an interoceanic canal than was Mr. Clay nine years before. By resolution passed March 3 of that year, the President was requested to open negotiations with other nations, particularly with the Governments of Central America and New Granada, for the purpose of protecting such individuals or companies as might undertake to open communication between the two oceans by the construction of a ship canal, "and of securing forever, by such stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations on the payment of such reasonable tolls as may be established to compensate the capitalists who may engage in such undertaking and complete the work."

We note the words "the free and equal right of navigating such canal," and are impelled to ask, What is their natural and obvious import? Did the Senate of the United States in the adoption of that resolution employ words in their natural sense and intend what they said?

That we should now desire to compensate the great capitalist who has undertaken and completed the work by the collection of such reasonable tolls as would at least pay interest and for maintenance is but proper and natural.

The resolution passed by the House of Representatives four years later is even more clear in its expression of a purpose that the free and equal right to the use of the canal should be universal. That resolution requested the President—

To consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations with the governments of other nations, and particularly with those the territorial jurisdiction of which comprehends the Isthmus of Panama, and to which the United States have accredited ministers or agents, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus, and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal by all nations.

Then came the treaty of 1846 with New Granada. Then the interpretation of that treaty by President Polk, in his message transmitting it to the Senate. Referring to the Senate resolution of 1835, he said the ultimate object as presented by that resolution was "to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus." How was it to be secured? The treaty with New Granada provided for neutralization of the canal. The President, recognizing that by such means only could the ultimate object be secured, said:

There does not appear to be any other effectual means of securing to all nations the advantages of this important passage, but the guaranty of great commercial powers that the Isthmus shall be neutral territory. The interests of the world at stake are so important that the security of this passage between the two oceans can not be suffered to depend upon the wars and revolutions which may arise among different nations.

Time will hardly justify, nor is it necessary, I think, the further citation from many high authorities, all expressing the same high purpose in regard to an interoceanic canal and the earnest hope for its fulfillment.

The view of President Cleveland, however, is of special significance in the light of altered conditions. In his message of December 8, 1885, he said:

Whatever highway may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world must be for the world's benefit—a trust for mankind, to be removed from the chance of domination by any single power, nor become a point of invitation for hostilities or a prize for warlike ambition.

Further:

The lapse of years has abundantly confirmed the wisdom and foresight of those earlier administrations which, long before the conditions of maritime intercourse were changed and enlarged by the progress of the age, proclaimed the vital need of interoceanic transit across the American isthmus and consecrated it in advance to the common use of mankind by their positive declarations and through the formal obligation of treaties.

Further, President Cleveland continues:

These suggestions may serve to emphasize what I have already said on the score of the necessity of a neutralization of any interoceanic transit; and this can only be accomplished by making the uses of the route open to all nations and subject to the ambitions and warlike necessities of none.

"For the world's benefit," a trust for mankind, consecrated in advance to the common use of mankind by positive declaration and by treaties, a route open to all nations and subject to the ambitions and warlike necessities of none!

Mr. President, conditions have changed since Mr. Cleveland wrote and sent to the Senate that message withdrawing the unratified treaty with Nicaragua at that time and objecting to the attempt upon the part of the United States to acquire the right to build a canal through Nicaraguan territory. In acquiring the territory on which the canal is built, in securing the right to regulate and control it, subject to the rules we have adopted for its neutralization, we have in part diverged from Mr. Cleveland's policy of opposition to the "acquisition of new and distant territory," and yet it must be that something of the trust declared by all those earlier administrations and then wrought into subsequent treaties still exists. Our ownership, our control, but add to our responsibility. Instead of using them for the special advantage of any American interest, we should welcome them as the media whereby we shall graciously perform our obligation to promote that "entire equality" which the treaty demands.

I know that it is contended in certain quarters that since we have bought, built, and own, the doctrine of rebus sic stantibus applies; that under these materially altered conditions not contemplated at the time of the treaty the treaty is in fact abrogated. That Mr. Hannis Taylor is in error in his view to this effect, I think can be easily shown. He quotes the fourth article of the treaty, which provides—

That no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties to the present treaty; and concludes that no serious person will ever attempt so to distort—that is the word—these plain and explicit terms as to make it appear that they were intended to cover the then entirely unforeseen acquisition of the territory now known as the Canal Zone by the United States. It may be. But recurring again to a principle of construction with which we started, what do the words import to any person, whether especially serious or not?

The expression "no change of territorial sovereignty" is very broad and would include without "distortion" the acquisition of territory by the United States on which to build the canal.

And this was the precise thing contemplated by the negotiators of the treaty. It was in view of a contingency of this kind that the provision was made, or, at least, such a contingency was the controlling consideration, as appears from the evidence, in producing that provision.

There was much discussion over article 4, originally article 3a, as prepared by Lord Lansdowne. Different modifications were suggested. The British authorities were not willing to give up article 3a altogether, and Mr. Choate, under date of September 21, 1901, writing to Mr. Hay, in his narration of the statements of Lord Lansdowne, says:

But he said they could not give up article 3a altogether; that it was quite obvious that we might in the future acquire all the territory on both sides of the canal; that we might then claim that a treaty providing for the neutrality of a canal running through a neutral country could no longer apply to a canal that ran through American territory only; and he again insisted, as Lord Lansdowne had insisted, that they must have something to satisfy Parliament and the British public that in giving up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty they had retained and reasserted the "general principle" of it; that the canal should be technically neutral and should be free to all nations on terms of equality, and especially that in the contingency supposed—of the territory on both sides of the canal becoming ours—the canal, its neutrality, its being free and open to all nations on equal terms, should not be thereby affected; that without securing this they could not justify the treaty, either to Parliament or the public; that the preamble which had already passed the Senate was not enough, although he recognized the full importance of the circumstance of its having so passed.

He undoubtedly referred there to the statement in regard to neutralization found in the preamble of the treaty. These are trenchant words of Mr. Choate giving the view of Lord Lansdowne substantially in his own language less than 60 days before the treaty was signed. They not only effectually destroy the theory of Mr. Taylor, but that of Mr. Olney, based on the same ground, and most emphatically support the contention of the British Government and of our own diplomats on the point in controversy.

Why, Mr. President, it would not be a forced or constrained view to say that, in view of our historic attitude toward this canal, in view of our assurances of equality of benefits it would confer upon the nations of the world, given through diplomatic correspondence, resolutions of Congress, and messages of Presidents, that the acquisition of the territory, the ownership of the canal, with all the rights incident thereto, was merely casual or adventitious to the one great purpose of a canal open on equal terms to all, and that under whatsoever conditions it might be constructed, whether as a result of treaty or not, it would when constructed be free and equal to all who would treat it as neutral ground.

I know there are others on my side of this Chamber, for whose learning and judgment as lawyers and students I have profound respect, with whom I am happy to be in agreement in most things, who differ from me here; but as I apply all the tests at my command—the words of the treaty, the history leading up to it, the indisputable understanding of the negotiators, and, not least of all, the internal evidence, the unreasonableness of Great Britain agreeing to anything else but equal tolls—I am thoroughly persuaded that the provision in the act of 1912, the repeal of which is asked, is an infraction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

That the exemption of our coastwise traffic from the payment of tolls would be a discrimination prohibited by rule 1 has been, I think, abundantly shown.

Are we prejudiced by the treaty? Have we made a bad bargain, granting that the construction I have contended for is right, that ours is one of the "all nations," that "neutralization" involves equal tolls as well as protection against the chances and dangers of war?

Are our physical dangers enhanced? Do the people suffer from any commercial disadvantages sustained under this treaty?

Rules 2 to 6, inclusive, of article 3 all relate to a state of war or disorder, and are for the protection of the canal and the safety of the commerce passing through it.

The United States may be either a neutral or belligerent Nation. If the former, she would independently of the treaty, as owner of the zone through which the canal is built and under the law of nations, be bound to protect the neutrality of the canal.

Dr. Holland in his work on international law, in commenting on certain provisions proposed by Lord Granville to be incorporated in the Suez Canal convention, says that the provisions fixing a limitation of time as to ships of war, and prohibiting the disembarking of troops or munitions of war in the canal, and the provision that Egypt shall take all measures within its power to enforce the conditions imposed on the transit of belligerent vessels, are simply declaratory of the ordinary rules or usages of international law applicable to the territorial waters of Egypt when its sovereign is neutral. And so with all like provisions in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, they are but a codification, as it were, by treaty, of the law of nations affecting the use of the territory of a neutral by a belligerent nation. These are rules we are bound to observe, whether we adopt them or not.

Some fear has been expressed of the consequences that might flow from the prohibition against blockade, but an understanding of the meaning of the term will at once dispel the fear.

The provision that the canal shall never be blockaded is unnecessary, so far as any prohibition of this kind against the United States is concerned. The territory on which built, the canal itself, the ports at either end of the canal belong to the United States. A blockade by the United States would involve the absurdity of a nation blockading its own waters and ports. The term is never so used in international law. It is an enemy coast or port that is "blockaded." Moreover, a blockade exists when the vessels of all nations are prevented from entry or departure. If the United States as a belligerent nation were to prevent the men-of-war of an enemy nation from entering the canal, it would not be a blockade, and hence not within the prohibition of the rules. If the prevention by the United States of all vessels, vessels of war as well as vessels of commerce, vessels of an enemy nation as well as a neutral nation, could be termed a blockade, then I submit that the provisions of the treaty in regard to blockade should govern and the United States in the interests of peace and the commerce of the world should come within the rule. But such a proceeding on the part of the United States is not blockade, and happily it is a rule which no nation will ever invoke against the United States.

Being a neutral nation, the United States is bound to prevent any act of hostility within the canal. Being a belligerent nation, is she prevented by the rules from committing any act of hostility within the canal?

Plainly not, if that act of hostility is necessary for the preservation of the canal or the approaches to the canal, or to enforce the peace and order of the canal against an enemy, and I see no reason for supposing that international law would not give her the right as a belligerent nation to prevent by force the passage of any hostile vessel bent on attacking the fortifications at the canal or any port or place on either coast of the United States.

These provisions of the treaty must be construed in connection with that fundamental principle recognized in the law of nations as in the law governing individual conduct—the right of self-preservation. The rules of the treaty, instead of being inconsistent with these fundamental principles, are to be construed in the light of them. Nobody need be apprehensive of our safety or our rights under the war rules of the treaty.

I think I am safe in saying that prior to 1903, when by a fortunate coup de etat we acquired the Canal Zone, there was no sense of fear that we might suffer at the hands of our enemies through the use of the canal. Had it been built under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, or a treaty made with any South or Central American Republic, it would have been under the stipulations guaranteeing its neutrality and making it open on terms of entire equality to the commerce of the world. The fear, contradictory as it may seem, is born of the very power we have, or else the possession of the power has given us a vision of the opportunity for great material and commercial advantage, stimulated a subtle genius for treaty interpretations, as it were, but blinded us somewhat to the value of the sense of fairness, the worth of national friendships, the sacredness of treaty obligations.

Mr. President, I have been most interested in examining the terms of the treaty itself and have given little attention to the economic side of the question. But it occurs to me that without any attempt to favor any interest we are going to reap great benefit from this canal. By reason of our proximity and the vastness of our coastwise trade, stimulated as it will be, too, by this means of quick transit, the trade itself will profit, the cities of either coast will profit, the people of the States bordering the Atlantic and Pacific will profit, and finally some modicum of benefit might filter down to the ultimate consumer in the interior of the country. We were glad to get rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in order that we might build this canal for the general good. We had again and again estopped ourselves from denying its force, and were in the interest of peace and good will, if not in honor, bound to get rid of it before we could ourselves build and own the canal. We knew the enterprise would be to our great advantage and our great renown without a thought of greater advantage resulting from discrimination in favor of any American interest. I would rather not imperil the renown by seeking such greater advantage.

One feature of the situation is the two classes of special interests involved—the transcontinental railroad lines; the companies engaged in coastwise shipping trade. In opposing this repeal we frankly avow that the American Congress should so legislate as to "play off" one interest against the other, the alleged end in view being the public welfare and to conserve the public interests.

It does not appeal to me as an attractive spectacle; it is rather a confession of weakness, of inefficiency in government, of inability to employ the administrative means the law has already provided for the control of interstate rates and traffic. The railroads now spanning the continent have had their splendid share in the development of the resources of the Nation. They have annihilated distance. It is not fanciful to say they have peopled the forests and the plains stretching between the Alleghanies and Rockies and beyond. It is impossible to estimate the extent to which they have accelerated the advance of civilization into and throughout the wilderness of America, making it blossom as the rose. A century without their aid would show less of achievement in the settlement and development of our country than a brief dozen years with them. They have earned and proved their right to live. I think we have the means at hand in the powers given the Interstate Commerce Commission to let them live and under honest administration produce fair returns to their owning stockholders, yet subject always to the interests of the great public whom they serve. If we are without such means to regulate and control, to prevent extortion, let us with diligence find the means. It will be a thousand times more dignified, more in keeping with the idea of wholesome, efficient government than like a nation of hucksters and jockeys to say we will bring one great transportation interest "to time," or perhaps embarrass it by giving a gratuity or a subsidy to another transportation interest already specially favored.

For subsidy it would be. In his note of reply to Sir Edward Grey, the British secretary for foreign affairs, Mr. Knox, our then Secretary of State, lays great stress on the admission of His Majesty's Government that we would have the right to subsidize our vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, and without in terms anywhere claiming the right to discriminate by exempting such vessels from the payment of tolls he does say that such exemption would be a subsidy. It is so admitted by the opponents of repeal. I have but one question to ask. Say what we may about the wisdom of such a policy, what Senator here, Democrat or Republican, not living in a State bordered by the ocean or the Gulf, but in a State without its "bays and broad-armed ports where laughing at the storm rich navies ride," will declare his readiness now to support a bill for subsidy direct to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, the property and the business not of the Nation, but of individuals and corporations who are not only already exempt from the tonnage duties which craft in foreign trade must pay, but have a monopoly of the coastwise trade as against the rest of the world? Yet tolls exemption is a subsidy. There is the widespread belief that a subsidy is wrong in principle. Without questioning whether it is or not I am opposed to any attempt to accomplish by indirection, and yet in this case to accomplish most effectually, what we would not attempt to accomplish by direct means, knowing the great public would disapprove and condemn.

Mr. President, an enterprise like the Panama Canal, of such tremendous advantage as it is likely to be to all our commerce, without discrimination in favor of any, should not be sullied or be the means now of laying us open to the charge of national selfishness by an attempt to secure for ourselves yet greater advantage. There is the treaty; to abide by it is not to surrender. Should its terms ever prove burdensome we may with profit recur to the words of Mr. Olney, on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—

> If changed conditions now make stipulations which were once deemed advantageous either inapplicable or injurious, the true remedy is not in ingenious attempts to deny the existence of the treaty or explain away its provisions, but in a direct and straightforward application to Great Britain for a reconsideration of the whole matter.

But I am satisfied that as time goes on we will never as a people regret that interpretation which appeals to the noblest impulses of men, which is free from selfishness, which involves a national magnanimity as great as the enterprise itself is vast. What we have wrought by our might, our wealth, our genius for engineering and physical achievement shall find a parallel worthy of the work in the free and equal use by the world to which we now devote it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in the course of the very remarkable and able address made by the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] a few days since, he said:

> No real coastwise trade will go through that canal. It is a thousand miles and more away from our coast. The trade that goes through it will be real over-seas trade, carried on by great ships, making long voyages—in its nature the exact antithesis to real coastwise trade.

Mr. President, heretofore in this discussion it has been assumed that all vessels proceeding from one port of the United States to another port of the United States are engaged in the coastwise trade. The announcement of the contrary doctrine by the distinguished Senator makes it necessary to pause to inquire how much there is in the suggestion that this is not coastwise trade.

I am going to content myself, Mr. President, with submitting, for the information of the Senate, the adjudication of the courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States, upon that question. In the seventh volume of Cyclopedia, at page 268, will be found the following:

Coastwise trade: Coasting trade, trade, or intercourse carried on by sea between two ports or places belonging to the same country. (7 Cyc., 268.)

The question as to what is or is not coastwise trade or coasting trade received the attention of many of the courts in the earlier history of our country. I find that the Supreme Court of the State of California gave at one time a very succinct and terse definition in the case of San Francisco against the California Steam Navigation Co., reported in the tenth volume of the California Reports at page 505. The opinion is by Judge Baldwin, Judge Field, afterwards associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, concurring. The opinion is brief, and I read:

The acts relied on by respondent impose these dues on all vessels plying coastwise and entering the harbor of San Francisco; and the only question raised on the record is whether the defendants' vessels are embraced by this definition.

The terms "plying coastwise," in this connection, and the "coasting trade" have a settled meaning. They were intended to indicate vessels engaged in the domestic trade, or plying between port and port in the United States, as contradistinguished from those vessels engaged in the foreign trade or plying between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country. This is evident from the various regulations of commerce made by acts of Congress and otherwise, and the numerous decisions of the Supreme Courts of the Union and of the several States. (See Benedict's Admiralty, 131, 123, 28, 35; 1 U. S. Stat. L., 55; Id., 94; Id., 305; 3 Id., 492; 5 Id., 304; see also 1 Wend., 557; Walker v. Blackwell, 1 Wend., 557; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1.)

In Steamboat Co. v. Livingston (3 Cowen, 713), the court, giving a definition of the words "coasting trade," says: "According to the coasting trade, it means commercial intercourse carried on between different districts in the same State and between different places in the same district on the seacoast or on a navigable river."

* * * * * * *

These authorities, and many more cited by the respondent's counsel, are conclusive of the legal meaning attached to the language criticized when used in revenue and navigation laws, and they are decisive of this case.

The Supreme Court of the United States said in the case of Belden against Chase, reported in One hundred and fiftieth United States, at page 696:

Ordinarily the terms "coaster" and "coasting vessel" are applied to vessels plying exclusively between domestic ports, and usually to those engaged in domestic trade as distinguished from vessels engaged in the foreign trade or plying between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1.)

The very question that is here presented came before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Huss v. New York & Porto Rico Steamship Co. (182 U. S., 392), in which the question was presented as to whether a vessel engaged in trade between Porto Rico and New York was engaged in the coastwise trade. The court says with reference to it—I read from the syllabus:

Vessels engaged in trade between Porto Rican ports and ports of the United States are engaged in the coasting trade in the sense in which those words are used in the New York pilotage statutes, and steam vessels engaged in such trade are coastwise steam vessels under Revised Statutes, section 4444.

I read from the body of the opinion as follows:

Under the commercial and navigation laws of the United States merchant vessels are divisible into two classes: First, vessels registered pursuant to Revised Statutes, section 4131. These must be wholly owned, commanded, and officered by citizens of the United States, and are alone entitled to engage in foreign trade. And, second, vessels enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade or fisheries. (Rev. Stat., sec. 4311.) These may not engage in foreign trade, under penalty of forfeiture. (Sec. 4337.) This class of vessels is also engaged in navigation upon the Great Lakes and the interior waters of the country; in other words, they are engaged in domestic instead of foreign trade.

The words "coasting trade," as distinguishing this class of vessels, seem to have been selected because at that time all the domestic commerce of the country was either interior commerce or coastwise, between ports upon the Atlantic or Pacific coasts or upon islands so near thereto and belonging to the several States as properly to constitute a part of the coast. Strictly speaking, Porto Rico is not such an island, as it is not only situated some hundreds of miles from the nearest port on the Atlantic coast, but had never belonged to the United States or any of the States composing the Union. At the same time trade with that island is properly a part of the domestic trade of the country since the treaty of annexation, and is so recognized by the Porto Rican or Foraker Act. By section 9 the Commissioner of Navigation is required to "make such regulations * * * as he may deem expedient for the nationalization of all vessels owned by the inhabitants of Porto Rico on April 11, 1899, * * * and for the admission of the same to all the benefits of the coasting trade of the United States; and the coasting trade between Porto Rico and the United States shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great coasting districts of the United States." By this act it was evidently intended not only to nationalize all Porto Rican vessels as vessels of the United States, and to admit them to the benefits of their coasting trade, but to place Porto Rico substantially upon the coast of the United States and vessels engaged in trade between that island and the continent as engaged in the coasting trade. This was the view taken by the executive officers of the Government in issuing an enrollment and license to the Ponce, to be employed in carrying on the coasting trade, instead of treating her as a vessel engaged in foreign trade.

Not only that, Mr. President, but long ago Congress declared that commerce between Alaska and any port of the United States, of course the vessels engaged in that commerce, passing through the waters adjacent to foreign countries is coasting trade, and that commerce is entitled to the same exemption and subject to the same restrictions as the coasting trade generally. With reference to that the Supreme Court says, in the opinion from which I am reading:

That the words "coasting trade" are not intended to be strictly limited to trade between ports in adjoining districts is also evident from Revised Statutes, section 4358, wherein it is enacted that "the coasting trade between the territory ceded to the United States by the Emperor of Russia, and any other portion of the United States, shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great districts." These great districts were, for the more convenient regulation of the coasting trade, divided by the act of March 2, 1819 (3 Stat., 492, ch. 48), as amended by the act of May 7, 1822 (3 Stat., 684; Rev. Stat., sec. 4348), as follows: "The first to include all the collection districts on the seacoast and navigable rivers between the eastern limits of the United States and the southern limits of Georgia; the second to include all the collection districts on the seacoast and navigable rivers between the River Perdido and the Rio Grande; and the third to include all the collection districts on the seacoast and navigable rivers between the southern limits of Georgia and the River Perdido." A provision similar to that for the admission of the Territory of Alaska was also adopted in the act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii (31 Stat., 141, sec. 98), which provides that all vessels carrying Hawaiian registers on August 12, 1888, and owned by citizens of the United States or citizens of Hawaii, "shall be entitled to be registered as American vessels, * * * and the coasting trade between the islands aforesaid and any other portion of the United States shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great coasting districts."

This use of the words "coasting trade" indicates very clearly that the words were intended to include the domestic trade of the United States upon other than interior waters. The district court was correct in holding that the Ponce was engaged in the coasting trade, and that the New York pilotage laws did not apply to her.

That case as it was considered in the lower court is reported in One hundred and fifth volume Federal Reporter, at page 78, from which I read, as follows:

Upon the acquisition of Alaska the same terms were used and in the same manner for the extension of the "coasting trade" between the United States and that Territory far beyond any contiguous coast line of the United States (act July 27, 1868; Rev. Stat., sec. 4358), and in the act of April 30, 1900, to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii (31 Stat., 141, 161, ch. 339, par. 98), there is also provision for the "coasting trade between the Hawaiian Islands and any other portion of the United States," in the same language that is employed in the last clause of section 9. This extended use of the words "coasting trade" was already familiar. Numerous decisions of the Commissioner of Navigation as respects trade and navigation by American vessels between these Territories and the United States have, moreover, held such trade to be a part of the coasting trade of the United States, entitling the vessels to sail under enrollments and licenses with the privileges and exemptions attaching thereto (Dec. 6,106, Jan. 8, 1884; also Decs. 5,618, 18,859, 19,364, 22,201, May 3, 1900); and the same has been ruled by the commissioner with regard to trade with Porto Rico since the act of April 12, 1900, by Treasury decision 22,232, May 16, 1900. It was under these rulings that the registers of these vessels were surrendered and coasting licenses taken out.

Mr. President, significance is given to this language not only in this country but as well as in England, for by their general customs-consolidation act of 1876 the coasting trade is defined as follows:

All trade by sea from one part of the United Kingdom to any other part thereof shall be deemed to be a coasting trade, and all ships employed therein shall be deemed coasting ships, and no part of the United Kingdom, however situated with regard to any other part, shall be deemed in law, with reference to each other, to be parts beyond seas.

Accordingly, Mr. President, it occurs to me that in the further consideration of this matter we shall be obliged to consider that our own vessels passing through the Panama Canal from one port of the United States to another port of the United States are in law engaged in the coasting trade.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, if no Senator desires to address the Senate at this time on the subject of the unfinished business, I ask that it may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK). Without objection, it is so ordered.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. THORNTON. I now ask unanimous consent to have taken up for consideration House bill 14034, being the naval appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 14034) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, as Senators will see by the report on the bill, the estimates of the department for the naval appropriation bill for this year were something in excess of $144,000,000. The House cut that down by over $4,000,000, leaving the amount reported something over $139,000,000, nearly $140,000,000, and the bill was passed by the House substantially for that amount. The amount as reported by the Senate committee is not quite $141,000,000, being an increase over the House bill of slightly over $1,000,000.

The principal items of increase in the Senate bill over the House bill are for the Indianhead powder factory, the increase in the appropriation for the various navy yards, for fuel-oil storage at San Francisco, and the naval disciplinary barracks, the largest single item being half a million dollars for the Indianhead powder factory.

It has been the object of the committee to avoid all useless expenditures in this bill, while at the same time giving all that was considered absolutely necessary for the use of the department—not for the sacrifice of human life, as was said on this floor by a Senator last week; not for the purpose of men killing each other, as was said by another Senator during the same afternoon; but in order to maintain the efficiency of that great arm of the national defense which lately has so splendidly demonstrated its ability to move swiftly and act strongly in the matter of the protection of the national honor.

I now ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendments, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Louisiana? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, a great many Senators are absent who probably do not know that the naval bill is now being taken up. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	McLean	Sheppard
Brady	Hitchcock	Martin, Va.	Shively
Bristow	Hollis	Nelson	Stephenson
Bryan	Jones	Norris	Sterling
Burton	Kenyon	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Catron	Kern	Oliver	Swanson
Chamberlain	La Follette	Page	Thornton
Clapp	Lippitt	Perkins	Tillman
Cummins	Lodge	Pomerene	Vardaman
du Pont	McCumber	Saulsbury	Walsh

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. Let the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The names of the absentees will be called.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. LANE, Mr. MYERS, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. STONE, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. WORKS answered to their names when called.

Mr. HUGHES, Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, Mr. REED, Mr. GORE, Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. WHITE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Secretary will read the bill for action on the amendments of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Pay, miscellaneous," on page 3, line 24, after the word "proper," to strike out "$46,000" and insert "$150,000," and, on page 4, line 6, after the date "1915," to insert "Provided further, That the sum of $104,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be expended, on the approval and authority of the Secretary of the Navy, for entertaining the officers and crews of foreign fleets which may be sent to attend and participate in the Panama-Pacific International Exposition in consequence of the invitation of the President of the United States, extended in pursuance of the authority contained in the joint resolution of Congress approved February 15, 1911, and of the authority contained in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1911, and for defraying such other expenses incident to the visit of the said foreign fleets as the Secretary of the Navy may deem proper, and the said sum shall be available until November 15, 1915," so as to make the clause read:

Contingent, Navy: For all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, exclusive of personal services in the Navy Department, or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., arising at home or abroad, but impossible to be anticipated or classified, to be expended on the approval and authority of the Secretary of the Navy, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, $150,000: Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow, in the settlement of accounts of disbursing officers involved, payments made under the appropriation "Contingent, Navy," to civilian employees appointed by the Navy Department for duty in and serving at naval stations maintained in the island possessions during the fiscal year 1915: Provided further, That the sum of $104,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be expended, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 5, to insert:

That the tolls that have been or may be prescribed by the President, in pursuance of the authority contained in the Panama Canal act, approved August 24, 1912, to be levied by the Government of the United States for the use of the Panama Canal shall not be assessed against nor collected from any war vessel of any foreign nation which may pass through the Panama Canal en route to or in returning from the Panama-Pacific International Exposition: Provided, That such vessel has been sent by its Government to attend and participate in the said exposition in consequence of the invitation of the President of the United States, extended in pursuance of the authority contained in the joint resolution of Congress approved February 15, 1911, and of the authority contained in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1911.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 19, to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and empowered to define and establish suitable anchorage grounds in Hampton Roads, Va., and the adjacent waters for the combined fleets of the United States and foreign Governments which may rendezvous there prior to proceeding to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, to be held at the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., in the year 1915, as well as to define and establish suitable anchorage grounds in the Bay of San Francisco and the approaches and waters adjacent thereto during the continuance of the said Panama-Pacific International Exposition, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby further authorized to make such rules and regulations regarding the movements of all vessels in all of the waters named as may be necessary in order to insure the proper and orderly conduct of such features as may be planned for the combined fleets and to provide for the safety of the vessels participating therein; and such rules and regulations when so issued and published shall have the force and effect of law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Navigation," on page 7, line 12, after the words "recruiting parties," to strike out "$130,000" and insert "$150,000," so as to read:

Recruiting: Expenses of recruiting for the naval service; rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same; advertising for and obtaining men and apprentice seamen; actual and necessary expenses in lieu of mileage to officers on duty with traveling recruiting parties, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 23, after the word "ranges," to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$115,000," so as to make the clause read:

Gunnery exercises: Prizes, trophies, and badges for excellence in gunnery exercises and target practice; for the establishment and maintenance of shooting galleries, target houses, targets, and ranges; for hiring established ranges, and for transportation of civilian assistants and equipment to and from ranges, $115,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 17, after "$90,000," to insert: "Provided, That as much of this appropriation as practicable shall be used in producing and preparing, by survey or otherwise, American charts and sailing directions to replace those of foreign production which now have to be purchased abroad; and for this purpose the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to detail such naval officers as may be necessary to the Hydrographic Office," so as to make the clause read:

Ocean and lake surveys.—Hydrographic surveys, including the pay of the necessary hydrographic surveyors, cartographic draftsmen and recorders, and for the purchase of nautical books, charts, and sailing directions, $90,000: Provided, That as much of this appropriation as practicable shall be used in producing and preparing, by survey or otherwise, American charts and sailing directions to replace those of foreign production which now have to be purchased abroad; and for this purpose the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to detail such naval officers as may be necessary to the Hydrographic Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 2, after the word "consideration," to insert: "And provided further, That the pensions of beneficiaries of the Naval Home shall be disposed of in the same manner as prescribed for inmates of the Soldiers' Home, as provided for in section 4 of the act approved March 3, 1883, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, except that in the case of death of any beneficiary leaving no heirs at law nor next of kin any pension due him shall, subject to the foregoing provisions, escheat to the naval pension fund," so as to read:

That the governor of the Naval Home is hereby authorized and directed, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, to make diligent inquiry in every instance after the death of an inmate to ascertain the whereabouts of his heirs or next of kin: And provided further, That claims may be presented hereunder at any time within five years after moneys have been so deposited in the Treasury, and, when supported by competent proof in any case after such deposit in the Treasury, shall be certified to Congress for consideration: And provided further, That the pensions of beneficiaries of the Naval Home shall be disposed of in the same manner as prescribed for inmates of the Soldiers' Home, as provided for in section 4 of the act approved March 3, 1883, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, except that in the case of death of any beneficiary leaving no heirs at law nor next of kin any pension due him shall, subject to the foregoing provisions, escheat to the naval pension fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Ordnance," on page 19, line 6, after the word "until," to strike out "June 30, 1916," and insert "expended," so as to make the clause read:

For modifying or renewing breech mechanisms of 3-inch, 4-inch, 5-inch, and 6-inch guns, to be available until expended, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 10, after the word "until," to strike out "June 30, 1916," and insert "expended," so as to make the clause read:

For replacing Mark VI 6-inch guns with Mark VIII guns and repairing and modernizing the Mark VI guns for issue, to be available until expended, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 12, after the word "until," to strike out "June 30, 1916," and insert "expended," so as to make the clause read:

For liners for eroded guns, to be available until expended, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 20, after the word "until," to strike out "June 30, 1916," and insert "expended," so as to make the clause read:

Torpedoes and appliances: For the purchase and manufacture of torpedoes and appliances, to be available until expended, $1,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 22, line 2, after "$425,000," to insert:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized in his discretion to exceed the amount appropriated under "maintenance, yards and docks," in an amount equal to the total of such expenditures in navy yards heretofore charged to other appropriations as properly constitute a part of yard maintenance: Provided, That no expenditures shall be thus transferred from any other appropriations to the appropriation "maintenance, yards and docks," except as may be necessary to compute more accurately the cost of work at navy yards, including all direct and indirect charges incident thereto: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to report the sum or sums transferred and the necessity therefor: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall operate to increase the total amount appropriated for the naval service.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I make the point of order against that amendment that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Virginia that, though he is the proper judge of his own action in the matter, the department consider that this amendment is necessary. They gave two reasons for it. One was economy in the administration of the yards, and the other was to be able to show by the system of bookkeeping exactly the cost of the maintenance of those yards.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Virginia state his ground for making the point of order against the amendment?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is general legislation, Mr. President; it lays down rules and regulations, and authorizes money to be used for one purpose which is appropriated for another purpose. It seems to me that it is plainly a matter of legislation, and not a matter of appropriation, that is referred to in the amendment.

It is true the amendment is so vague and indefinite as to be difficult of comprehension; I am not clear as to what is aimed at in the amendment; but it seems to contain nothing but a legislative provision. I hardly supposed that the committee would insist that it was in order; indeed, I understand from a member of the committee that he has no question whatever that it is general legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is in some doubt. It seems to be rather a vague provision, but it apparently gives a latitude or discretionary authority to the Secretary of the Navy to transfer an amount of money appropriated to one fund to another fund. Is that a correct statement of the amendment?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It gives the Secretary of the Navy the right to use an indefinite sum of money; it makes various appropriations, and then authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to use the money so appropriated for other purposes, which could not be done except by legislative enactment. The Secretary of the Navy could not possibly have the right to take money appropriated for specific purposes and use that money for other purposes without such authority. It is a legislative provision of a general nature; it is not giving a specific direction to an appropriation. If it were simply that, the amendment would be in order, but it is a general authority, a legislative provision governing the disposition of moneys appropriated by this bill. It is not a limitation or direction as to a particular appropriation for a particular purpose, limiting it or making it conditional on any specific fact or in the discretion of the Secretary; but it is a general legislative provision relating to appropriations contained in the bill. It seems to me it is something that the Secretary could not possibly do except when authorized by legislation. I repeat, this is a legislative provision authorizing him to do those things. It seems to me to be plainly in violation of the rule.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I do not, of course, propose to debate the question, knowing that I can not do so under the rules, but inasmuch as the Chair has expressed some doubt as to the meaning of the amendment, I should like to read a letter from the Navy Department, addressed to myself, expressing the ideas of the department as to what was meant by the provision, if that would throw any light on the situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be glad to have the Senator read the letter.

Mr. THORNTON. The letter is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, May 18, 1914.

The Hon. J. R. THORNTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I take pleasure in complying with your request for further information as to the reason for and effect of the amendment incorporated by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs into the pending appropriation bill—on lines 2 to 17 of printed page 22—with respect to computing the cost of navy-yard work.

The said amendment carries no additional appropriation.

It is aimed to facilitate the revision of existing regulations in such manner as to separate cost of upkeep from cost of output.

Since the act of June 24, 1910, provides that the cost of navy-yard work shall include all charges incident thereto, the whole question of Navy cost keeping depends upon the proper interpretation of the word "incident." If too broad an interpretation be used and upkeep expenses at navy yards be consequently spread over the cost of output without proper discrimination, then costs of navy-yard construction will appear to be greater than they are in fact. Such seems to have occurred under present conditions, which conditions the amendment will aid in improving.

The necessity for maintaining navy yards is not open to question. They must be kept in working order as a part of the national defense; and as the expense of maintenance will go on whether any ships are built there or not, the legitimate charge to construction includes only the additional expense over and above what would have been incurred if such construction had been done elsewhere. Hence, when Congress asks for a statement of building costs, it is misleading to be obliged to answer with a total which includes pure upkeep.

The passage of the amendment referred to will materially assist this department in correctly separating the said charges and more nearly effectuating the intent of the law.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is disposed to rule that the amendment is general legislation, and will sustain the point of order.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, at the top of page 23, to strike out:

That to carry out the purpose of so much of the act of March 4, 1913, as authorizes the President to have constructed one supply ship, to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $1,425,000, there is hereby appropriated for the improvement of building slips and equipment $148,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 6, to strike out:

The unexpended balance under the appropriation "Marine barracks, Boston, Mass.," for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, is hereby covered back into the Treasury.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the unobligated balance under the appropriation "Marine barracks, Boston, Mass.," for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, not exceeding $148,000, is hereby made available for building slip and equipment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 18, after the words "Pier D," to strike out "$12,000" and insert "$25,000"; in line 19, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$130,000" and insert "$150,000"; in line 21, after "$15,000," to insert "extend second-floor mold loft, $8,500"; and in line 23, after the name "New York," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "$122,000" and insert "$143,500," so as to make the clause read:

Navy yard, New York, N. Y.: Paving and grading, to continue, $15,000; yard railroad, extension and equipment, $15,000; to complete Pier D, $25,000; toward construction of Pier C (cost not to exceed $150,000), $65,000; distributing system, extensions, to continue, including separator receivers, $15,000; extend second-floor mold loft, $8,500; in all, navy yard, New York, N. Y., $143,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 1, after "$15,000," to insert "building slips and equipment, $200,000," and in line 2, after the name "Philadelphia," to strike out "$65,000" and to insert "$265,000," so as to make the clause read:

Navy yard, Philadelphia, Pa.: Quay walls and piers, $50,000; power-plant improvement (to install rotary converters), $15,000; building slips and equipment, $200,000; in all, navy yard, Philadelphia, $265,000.

Mr. THORNTON. On page 24, line 1, after the word "building," the word should be "slip" instead of "slips," so as to read "building slip." I move that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 24, after line 3, to insert:

Navy yard, Washington, D. C.: Fireproof general storehouse (cost not to exceed $225,000), $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 7, after the name "Virginia," to strike out "Repairs" and insert "New dry dock (to cost $3,000,000), $200,000; repairs," and in line 12, after "$450,000," to insert "in all, navy yard, Norfolk, Va., $225,000," so as to make the clause read:

Navy yard, Norfolk, Va.: New dry dock (to cost $3,000,000), $200,000; repairs, buildings, St. Helena, $25,000; the 150-ton crane authorized by the act of March 4, 1913, shall be of the floating revolving type, and the limit of cost is hereby increased to $450,000; in all, navy yard, Norfolk, Va., $225,000.

Mr. THORNTON. On page 24, line 8, after the word "cost," I know that the bill which was reported to the Senate contained the words "not to exceed," but those words are not in the printed bill on Senators' desks. I suggest that amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Louisiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 8, after the word "cost," it is proposed to insert "not to exceed," so as to read: "to cost not to exceed $3,000,000."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having charge of this bill just what this item means as to this new dry dock. Does the making of the appropriation of $200,000, "to cost $3,000,000," mean that the provision is giving the status that $3,000,000 is to be expended?

Mr. THORNTON. Yes, sir; not to exceed that much. In other words, it is estimated that the entire work will cost $3,000,000, of which $200,000 is now given for immediate purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Is there anything in any report of a committee or in hearings showing the necessity of this expenditure of $3,000,000?

Mr. THORNTON. Yes, sir. I will read a statement to the Senator. What I shall read is a letter from the Navy Department. It is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 9, 1914.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I deem it of the utmost importance that there be restored to the naval bill the authorization and initial appropriation requested by the department in its original estimates for a new dry dock at the Norfolk Navy Yard.

The necessity for this additional dock has been strongly represented to me by the General Board of the Navy and the experts and authorities of the Navy Department.

We have three docks at Norfolk at this time, but owing to the greater size and draft of our newer vessels they are only available for ships of less recent design. As a matter of fact, there are no docks under construction or contract on the Atlantic coast which can take a battleship of 30,000 tons, and only one dock—No. 4 at New York—when completed which can dock the Wyoming class. This is obviously a very serious state of affairs and one which should be remedied without delay.

The department and the General Board have long recognized the need for increased docking facilities, inadequacy of which in time of war might lead to serious consequences, for if several of our battleships of the first line were seriously damaged with only one dock available to receive them it would result in embarrassing delays, and moreover if the injuries were sustained while in action on the South Atlantic coast the absence of a suitable dry dock nearer than New York might result in the total loss of a ship through its unseaworthiness for a long voyage. Such a circumstance would also deprive the fleet of one or more vessels, which would have to be withdrawn to convoy the injured vessel or vessels up the coast.

Norfolk is the most logical point for another big dock. It has coaling and repair facilities right at hand, of quick and easy access by the same entrance channel, and it is at Hampton Roads more frequently than elsewhere where we have the fleet rendezvous.

I respectfully urge that the following be inserted on page 22 of the naval bill as reported to the House, following "$25,000," in line 21, viz, "new dry dock, to cost $3,000,000, $200,000."

Very sincerely,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if there was an estimate before the committee of the cost of this dry dock? Was the letter the Senator has just read the only estimate before the committee? How did $3,000,000 happen to be agreed upon?

Mr. THORNTON. It was estimated that the work would cost $3,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. That was an estimate by whom?

Mr. THORNTON. By the department.

Mr. KENYON. By the Navy Department?

Mr. THORNTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENYON. Were there any hearings before the committee as to Norfolk being the best place for a dry dock?

Mr. THORNTON. I shall have to ask the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to answer that, he perhaps being more familiar with it than I.

Mr. KENYON. It is an innocent looking item, but it involves the expenditure of $3,000,000.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator from Iowa that we are building a dry dock of this character at Pearl Harbor, in the Hawaiian Islands, for the Pacific coast. The department has for years and years, through the General Board, consisting of Admirals Dewey, Wainwright, and others, recommended continuously the construction of such a dock at Norfolk. Nearly one-half of all the ships that are docked on the Atlantic coast are docked at Norfolk; to be accurate, about 50 per cent. The statistics will show that; and it is impossible on the Atlantic coast, with the present inadequate docking facilities, for docking to be made with sufficient rapidity. If an injury happens to a battleship, there is only one dock where it can be docked at present, and that is in New York. When the Arkansas was injured it took nearly three months before she could be released from the dock, and consequently if anything should happen to a number of ships, or if any emergency should arise, unless there was another dock to repair ships we would be almost helpless.

The department has made an estimate as to what the new dry dock will cost, the ultimate cost to be some $3,000,000, the items being given in the hearings. This matter has been before Congress and has been urged from year to year, and the Navy Department says that there is no matter more important to the Navy than the construction of this dry dock.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator how long it will require to construct this dry dock?

Mr. SWANSON. It will take two years or more, possibly.

Mr. KENYON. Then, the balance of this money will be carried in the appropriation bill of next year?

Mr. SWANSON. It will be carried in the succeeding appropriation bills as needed, when the $200,000 now proposed to be appropriated has been expended. Next year they will make an estimate, and appropriations will be made as needed.

Mr. KENYON. This $200,000 will not carry the project forward for a year, will it?

Mr. SWANSON. It will carry it forward until Congress meets in December, when additional appropriations can be made as they are needed. That is the usual way such appropriations are made.

Mr. JONES. Mr President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. As I understand, the department can proceed to let contracts for the construction of this dry dock under this provision?

Mr. SWANSON. The department can let contracts for the construction of the dry dock under this provision not to exceed the sum of $3,000,000.

Mr. JONES. How many dry docks are there on the Atlantic coast?

Mr. SWANSON. There are three dry docks at Norfolk——

Mr. JONES. There are three at Norfolk now?

Mr. SWANSON. There are three now at Norfolk, but only one that is sufficient to accommodate our present modern battleships. There is one at Brooklyn, and I think there are dry docks of different sizes at all of the naval stations.

Mr. JONES. What I should like to know is how many dry docks there are on the Atlantic coast in which can be docked a modern battleship?

Mr. SWANSON. Only one for the very largest, latest ships, and that is at Brooklyn.

Mr. JONES. Just one?

Mr. SWANSON. And I think that is not completed.

Mr. LODGE. The one at Brooklyn is in process of construction.

Mr. JONES. Is there not any dry dock on the Atlantic coast in which modern battleships may be docked?

Mr. LODGE. Not battleships of the largest size.

Mr. JONES. I mean a dock that would accommodate one of the ships which has been provided for in the last few years.

Mr. LODGE. Not the largest sized battleships.

Mr. JONES. Where are they docked when they need to be docked?

Mr. LODGE. The very large battleships have only been built in the last few years.

Mr. JONES. Have we not had any of the large battleships completed in the last five years?

Mr. SWANSON. Battleship 39, now building, will have a displacement of 31,000 tons, and consequently will require a larger dock than a battleship of 20,000 tons; and the object of this amendment is to provide for a dock that will take care of such ships.

Mr. JONES. We have, then, as I understand, no dock on the Atlantic coast in which battleships that we have authorized during the last six or seven years can be docked?

Mr. SWANSON. There has been a great increase in the size of battleships in the last few years.

Mr. JONES. How many docks have we on the Atlantic that will dock the largest vessels authorized within the last six years?

Mr. LODGE. There is one at Portsmouth, one at Boston, one at New York, they are building a larger one at Brooklyn, and there is one at Charleston and one at Norfolk.

Mr. JONES. That makes five, and one under way.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will allow me, at page 844 of the Navy Yearbook, he will find a description of each dock in the United States, including their size and other data. If there is no objection, I will insert the table from the Yearbook bearing on the subject as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

Mr. JONES. That would not give me the information I want, because I would not know from it the size dock necessary to accommodate our battleships; and I want some member of the committee to give me that information.

Mr. SWANSON. The Panama Canal, when completed, will accommodate a vessel 1,000 feet long and 110 feet broad; and they are now constructing a dry dock in Brooklyn of those dimensions. The one at Norfolk is to be of a similar size, as it is estimated that that will be the ultimate size of battleships in the future.

Mr. JONES. How many dry docks have we on the Atlantic coast under way, if any, in which could be docked the battleship provided in the last naval appropriation bill?

Mr. SWANSON. None.

Mr. THORNTON. It was stated in the letter from which I have already quoted that—there are no docks under construction or contract on the Atlantic coast which can take a battleship of 30,000 tons.

Mr. LODGE. There is no dry dock sufficient to accommodate that battleship at the present time.

Mr. SWANSON. The construction of the dry dock at Norfolk has been urged from year to year.

Mr. KENYON. If we build larger battleships next year or the following year, the proposed dry dock at Norfolk will not be sufficient to accommodate them.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is mistaken. The capacity of the locks of the Panama Canal is presumed to measure the limit of size of the battleships which we will build. The dock in the Hawaiian Islands and the one proposed at Norfolk are designed to accommodate the largest vessels that can go through the Panama Canal.

Mr. KENYON. We shall build as large battleships as any other nation in the world, that is certain; and we had better have a dry dock that will be sufficient to last a few years if the size of the battleships shall be increased.

Mr. SWANSON. We are now building as large battleships as any other nation, and the proposed dock at Norfolk is intended to be able to dock a ship a thousand feet long and 110 feet broad. That is what the Navy Department desires.

Mr. KENYON. These dry docks are used sometimes, are they?

Mr. SWANSON. They are used continuously. If the Senator will look into the matter, he will find that Dock No. 1, at Norfolk, was used 234 days during the past year, Dock No. 2 was used 266 days, and Dock No. 3 was used 278 days. This indicates great use of these docks and evinces the vast importance of the Norfolk Navy Yard.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia made an interesting statement a few moments ago, to the effect that one-half of the repairs to the battleship fleet were made at Norfolk. Who determines that policy?

Mr. SWANSON. I referred to the number of days in which ships were docked, or, rather, to the number of vessels—of days in a year docked at Norfolk. During the past year 331 vessels were docked on the Atlantic, of which 144 were docked at Norfolk—about 40 per cent.

Mr. WEEKS. Why should that be so? Why should one-half of the repairs for the battleships be done at Norfolk when we have four or five other yards where there are dry docks?

Mr. SWANSON. That is due to the fact that the battleship fleet are at Hampton Roads more than anywhere else. That is where they rendezvous—where they have their practice. I did not mean to say that one-half of the repairs were made at Norfolk, but nearly one-half of the ships that are docked are sent to be docked at the dry dock there.

Mr. WEEKS. That amounts to the same thing.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator misunderstood me, if he understood me to say that one-half of the repairs are made at Norfolk. I do not suppose they do one-fourth of the repairing; but, on account of the nearness of the ships to the yard at Norfolk and on account of the rapidity with which it is desirable that the ships be placed in the dock, the records show that the figures I have given in regard to Norfolk are approximately accurate. It is because of this that the necessity arises for selecting Norfolk for this new dry dock.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, in that connection perhaps it might facilitate matters and might give some additional information to the Senator from Massachusetts if I should read again that one paragraph of the letter of Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Acting Secretary of the Navy, to the committee, showing why Norfolk is the proper place for this dry dock, about which there seems to be some difference of opinion. Mr. Roosevelt says:

Norfolk is the most logical point for another big dock. It has coaling and repair facilities right at hand, of quick and easy access by the same entrance channel, and it is at Hampton Roads more frequently than elsewhere where we have the fleet rendezvous.

Those are some of the general reasons which he gives.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if that is Mr. Roosevelt's opinion or the opinion of the General Board?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator from Louisiana will allow me, the General Board has recommended the construction of the new dry dock at Norfolk.

Mr. WEEKS. Has the General Board, in recommending a new dry dock, recommended that it be located at Norfolk?

Mr. SWANSON. I understand that it has.

Mr. WEEKS. Has it made that specific recommendation?

Mr. THORNTON. I will say that Mr. Roosevelt, Acting Secretary of the Navy, adds in his letter:

The necessity for this additional dock has been strongly represented to me by the General Board of the Navy and the experts and authorities of the Navy Department.

Mr. WEEKS. Of course, it goes without saying that so long as we continue to build battleships of large type every two or three years we will have to provide dry docks for them, but I could not quite understand from the statement which I understood the Senator from Virginia to make why one-half of the repairs or one-half of the docking was done at Norfolk, and it is almost certain that if this dock is built there an additional proportion of repairs and of docking will be done there in the future.

Mr. SWANSON. According to my understanding, of the number of days in which the dry docks of the Navy are used, those at Norfolk show about twice the use of any others. There are dry docks at other stations, but the fact that the dry docks at Norfolk are used so much more than the dry docks at other places was one of the reasons why the General Board recommended the construction of the new dry dock at Norfolk. Admiral Watts—and the unanimous sentiment of nearly all those connected with the Navy is that Norfolk is the proper place to locate the new dry dock.

Mr. WEEKS. Admiral Watts is not on the General Board, Mr. President. Admiral Watts is Chief of Construction.

Mr. SWANSON. Here is the report of the General Board on page 808 of the hearings:

The General Board is of opinion that this yard—

Referring to Norfolk—

should be steadily developed and efforts made to deepen the channels leading to it in the course of the next few years, and that it should be made one of our chief naval bases.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a moment ago, in answer to a question of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Virginia said that he thought it would take a year or two years to complete this dry dock. Does the Senator know when the battleship provided in the last naval appropriation bill will be completed?

Mr. SWANSON. I think one or two of our largest battleships have already been launched; and there is at present no place to dock it.

Mr. JONES. So that it can not be placed in dry dock until we construct this new dock?

Mr. SWANSON. No; except at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, where it might be docked.

Mr. JONES. I want to state to the Senator how long it has taken us heretofore to build these docks. The last dock at Norfolk was in course of construction from 1903 to 1911, or eight years.

Mr. SWANSON. It would depend upon how fast the money is appropriated.

Mr. JONES. That certainly was not the cause of the delay in the construction of the last dock in Norfolk. The appropriation for that dock was $1,728,000.

I am making these suggestions merely to show the urgency of the dry dock in which the Senator is interested. If the battleships which are now building and which it is proposed to authorize in this bill can not now be accommodated in any of the existing dry docks, we ought to hurry this new dock along as fast as possible.

Take the navy yard at Puget Sound. We have just completed a dry dock there that will take the largest battleship, and yet that dock was from 1908 to 1913 in process of construction, or five years, so that if there is any doubt about the money provided in this bill for the Norfolk dry dock being sufficient to carry on this work, we ought to resolve that doubt by seeing that an abundance of money is provided, because the first thing we know we will have two battleships and no place where they can be docked.

Mr. SWANSON. It was estimated that all they can spend now is $200,000 to begin the work.

Mr. JONES. I am merely calling the Senator's attention to the delay which we have experienced in building dry docks, ranging from five to eight years.

Mr. SWANSON. If an appropriation is made without delay, I am satisfied they can construct it in two years, or three certainly.

Mr. JONES. I am satisfied that the delay of eight years in the construction of the present dock at Norfolk was not because Congress did not provide the money. It must have been because the department failed to prepare the plans or let the contract, or something of that kind. That instance shows the time likely to be consumed in the construction of such dry docks.

Mr. THORNTON. It is very plain from the letter of the department that they appreciate the importance of the matter alluded to by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and they certainly will lose no time in getting the dry dock in a situation to handle the business that now can not be handled and to provide facilities which may be so much needed at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 21, after "$207,000," to insert "to be immediately available, dredging and diking, to continue, $20,000," and in line 23, after the words "in all," to strike out "$237,000" and insert "$257,000," so as to make the clause read:

Navy yard, Mare Island, Cal.: To complete quay wall, $20,000; modernizing electric-power and light-distributing systems, $10,000; improvement of hydraulics, Mare Island Straits, in accordance with report submitted in House Document No. 1103, Sixtieth Congress, second session, and such modifications as may be made therein in pursuance of the authority contained in the act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, approved October 22, 1913 (limit of cost $507,000), to complete, $207,000, to be immediately available; dredging and diking, to continue, $20,000; in all, $257,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand, we are considering the bill simply for committee amendments now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those are the only ones now being considered.

Mr. JONES. I send to the desk an amendment which I desire to have read and considered as pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. After "$155,000," on page 25, line 26, it is proposed to insert:

Building slip and equipment, $200,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 26, after line 2, to insert:

Naval station, Key West, Fla.: Toward construction of breakwater (limit of contract, $600,000), $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 11, to insert:

The limit of cost of the dry dock at the naval station, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, is hereby increased to $4,986,500.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the acting chairman of the committee or the Senator in charge of the bill to explain this item. I understand that no estimate has been made for this amount.

Mr. THORNTON. Yes; it has.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the estimate?

Mr. THORNTON. Just what is provided for here. I will read it to the Senator. I will say to the Senator that I also have here a letter, which I will read.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire whether the Senator is asking as to Key West or as to Hawaii?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on page 26, line 13.

Mr. KENYON. Is there any estimate as to Key West? I observe that the amendment relating to Key West has gone by without any explanation. I was anxious to have some explanation as to that. It seems to be quite a substantial sum, $600,000, though, of course, it is not much in comparison with Hawaii.

Mr. THORNTON. The explanation of it is that it was offered in the committee as an amendment to the House bill and accepted for the reason that it had been previously recommended—in last year's estimate—by the Navy Department.

Mr. KENYON. Was there not an appropriation last year for this purpose?

Mr. THORNTON. I understand there was not.

Mr. KENYON. This is a new project, then?

Mr. THORNTON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Pearl Harbor increase is estimated for.

Mr. THORNTON. We were on the Pearl Harbor item, but the Senator from Iowa has gone back now to Key West, Fla.

Mr. KENYON. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] was referring to Key West.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; I was not.

Mr. THORNTON. The Senator from Mississippi simply asked for an explanation about that; and I should like to read now the letter of the department which contains the information asked for by the Senator from Mississippi:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 9, 1914.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I respectfully recommend the restoration to the naval bill of the provision appearing on page 24, lines 4 and 5, of the naval bill as reported to the House, increasing the limit of cost of the dry dock at the naval station, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, to $4,986,500.

The act approved May 13, 1908, authorized the construction of "one graving dock, capable of receiving the largest war vessels of the Navy, at a cost not to exceed $2,000,000," and appropriated therefor the sum of $300,000. Plans were prepared and proposals were received on February 13, 1909, after public advertisement, for the construction of a dry dock 1,195 feet long, separated into two parts by an intermediate caisson. Bids received, being in excess of the amount authorized for the work, were necessarily rejected. Bids were again invited on May 22, 1909, and on July 22, 1909, formal contract was entered into with the San Francisco Bridge Co. for the construction of a dock having length of 589 feet between the inside of coping at head of the dock and outer sill. Contract was modified June 27, 1910, after obtaining increase in authorized limit of cost, to provide a dock having the following dimensions:

	Ft.	In.
Length inside of coping at head to outer sill	800
Length over all	831
Width over all	148
Width at entrance, top of keel blocks	110	1½
Width of entrance at coping level	123

By agreement, dated January 2, 1913, after obtaining a still further increase in authorized cost, the length was increased to 1,003 feet between inside of coping at head and outer sill, the other dimensions remaining unchanged.

Borings and examinations which were made before the award of the original contract indicated that the structure could be built in open excavation, and the work was started upon this assumption. During the month of May, 1911, after practically completing the excavation, the contractor began pumping a portion of the work which had been surrounded by a cofferdam; when a depth of about 20 feet had been obtained it was observed that there was a disturbance in the bottom strata, whereupon pumping was discontinued; after making certain examinations, including the driving of test piles, it was arranged by supplemental agreement, executed August 5, 1911, that the dock should be supported upon piling and that a certain amount of concrete in the bottom of the dock should be placed by the underwater method. Work was continued, and in January, 1912, the contractor again began pumping out a section of the work; after unwatering and exposing the concrete in the bottom it was found that on account of unusual physical conditions, in combination with difficulties involved in the placing of concrete under water, the concrete was not of satisfactory quality. Further elaborate investigations and experiments were then made, and in August, 1912, work was proceeded with, using a much richer mixture for the underwater concrete. On February 6, 1913, the contractor began unwatering the second section, and on February 17, following, while still unwatering, an upheaval of the bottom took place, which wrecked the cofferdam and the construction of this section.

After this failure, on receiving advice as to the seriousness of it, the department directed the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks and Civil Engineer F. R. Harris to go out there and examine the work and advise as to the steps necessary to carry it out to a successful completion, and at a later date arranged with Mr. Alfred Noble, an eminent consulting civil engineer of New York to visit Pearl Harbor and report on conditions and suggest remedies. The gist of all of these reports were that the department's plans for this dry dock could probably be carried out, but would involve great delay and serious hazard and gave no great assurance of the successful completion of the work or of its entire satisfaction after completion.

Following this the department learned from the Attorney General that the contractors were required to bring the dry dock contracted for to completion if it were physically possible to do so, but that they were not required to guarantee that the dock would endure and discharge its duty successfully after completion. In view of this opinion and of the failure to induce the contractors to open up any negotiations looking to a change of plan or method of construction, the department, in January, 1914, directed them to proceed with the work under the old plan and specifications. Later, however, in February, 1914, the contractors communicated their willingness to the department to take up the question of changes in their contract to secure a dock that would be perfectly satisfactory and durable. Pursuantly a conference was held at the department between Mr. Noble, the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and Civil Engineer Harris, which was attended by the chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, when all expressed the opinion that the construction of the dock under the old plans and specifications was not alone fraught with the greatest hazard and probable delay in eventual completion, if completed at all, but was inadvisable as an engineering work and was not based on satisfactory assurance and factors of safety, which are usually required in good engineering practice. In short, that it was impracticable.

These three engineers agreed that a different design, depending upon the use of floating caissons or boats, gave every assurance of the successful and early completion of this work, but that it would involve an increase in the authorization for this work of approximately, but not over, $1,500,000.

The contract obligation for the dry dock now stands at $3,168,461.61, of which the sum of $1,036,330.01 has been paid the contractor on monthly vouchers on account of work done.

There are sufficient funds remaining under the appropriation to defray the cost of proceeding with this dry dock on the new plans indicated during the next fiscal year, but to enable the department to enter into an agreement with the contractors to proceed on the new plans it will be necessary to increase the limit of authorized cost for this structure.

Very sincerely,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate, Washington.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is that the only estimate that has been made?

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Louisiana will permit me, this amendment makes no appropriation.

Mr. THORNTON. No; there is no specific appropriation made.

Mr. LODGE. There is no appropriation made. This is simply an increase of the limit of cost. It requires no estimate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the original contract for this work was executed by the man who had it?

Mr. LODGE. No; it was not, because the Navy Department kept increasing the size of the dock, and also because when they began to sink the foundations they found a condition which obliged them to change the whole structure of the dock from the original system to one of piling and concrete.

Mr. VARDAMAN. This increase of cost, then, is not due to any default on the part of the contractors?

Mr. LODGE. None whatever. This is the limit of cost recommended by the department as the closest estimate of cost they can make.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I notice that in 1908 the limit was $2,000,000, and it has been increased several times since that time.

Mr. LODGE. I think the limit of cost has been increased three or four times.

Mr. VARDAMAN. In 1908 it was $2,000,000; in 1910, $2,700,000; in 1912 it was further increased to $3,486,500; and now it is sought to increase it to $4,986,500. It seems that somebody is doing some very inaccurate calculating on this work.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the trouble arose in this way: The department ascertained that there were some difficulties in connection with the construction. They had agreed with this construction company to have the work done according to certain plans and specifications. When the difficulties arose in connection with the foundations and other matters the Navy Department sent its best engineering expert, Mr. Harris, there to ascertain what the trouble was with the dry dock, and what should be done. After going there he recommended these new plans as the best and most available that could be made for a dry dock there. We are compelled to have one there, as it is our Pacific outpost.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand the necessity for a dry dock there; but it has occurred to me that every time we send a man there he changes the plans.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, then the question was submitted to the Attorney General whether the contract with the builders required that the dock should be such that it would be available for the use desired by the Navy. After discussing and looking into the contract that had been made the Attorney General said that we could compel them to complete the dry dock according to the original plans and specifications, but that there was no liability on their part to see that the dock was capable of use by the department as they desired. After that, as I understand, the contractors and the Navy Department decided that they would adopt the plans recommended by Engineer Harris, who is the finest expert that the Navy Department has.

All this amendment does is to authorize the department to change the plans, to compromise with the people who were building the dock according to the other plans, which will not be of much use to us, on account of the condition of the foundation and otherwise, and to complete it so that it will be of use when completed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. How much money has been squandered on it?

Mr. SWANSON. None has been squandered. As our battleships increase in size, it necessitates an increase in the size of the docks.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But it seems to me the Navy Department should have taken into consideration the probability of enlarging the battleships, and should not have constructed a dock that would be worthless before it was finished.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator must recollect that, while it is very difficult to get a good dry dock there, it is of the utmost importance that we should have one.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Oh, I appreciate that very fully.

Mr. SWANSON. As you do your work, you are disappointed in the foundation, you are disappointed in the physical conditions, and consequently you have to change your plans and specifications to some extent.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But it seems that every man we have sent there has submitted a different plan. First it was $2,000,000, then $2,700,000, then three million and something, and now it is $4,900,000. It seems to me to indicate the most glaring incompetency or carelessness.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will read the hearings, in which the matter was thoroughly investigated by the House Committee on Naval Affairs, and the correspondence between the different officials, he will be convinced that the Government has acted wisely and economically, and that the difficulties surrounding them have been very well met, and as economically as it could have done. They had to stop very frequently on account of difficulties that were encountered. Everybody knows that Hawaii is the most important place of all in the Pacific for a dock. It is our outpost in the Pacific.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I appreciate that; but it seems that every expert, every man we have sent there, has changed the plans and has increased the figures—first $2,000,000, and then on up to nearly $5,000,000.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, there has been no money squandered or lost there. The money that has been spent has all been well spent. The department stopped further expenditure because the conditions the contractors found in their excavations were such that they were unable to go on without wasting what had been done, and that was what led to a resurvey and a new report on the subject. The department has neither squandered nor wasted money; but the excavations made in the region turned out differently from what their test piling had shown, and they were obliged to adopt some new and more expensive plans, in addition to enlarging the size of the dock.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Has the committee been given any assurance that this $4,900,000 will be sufficient? The department may change it again before the next session.

Mr. THORNTON. The head of the department says he has every assurance from the most competent engineers that this plan will work out right. That is all we can do.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill how much money is now available to carry on the construction of this dock?

Mr. LODGE. Enough to go on with, the Secretary says.

Mr. THORNTON. The sum of $3,168,461.61 was provided for originally for the first contract. Of that, the sum of $1,036,330.01 has been paid, and the difference will be available.

Mr. JONES. That has been actually appropriated by Congress, has it?

Mr. THORNTON. That has been appropriated for doing this work. Now they wish to increase the estimate so that it will amount to $4,986,500, for the reasons stated.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, they do not increase the estimate; they ask for an increase in the limit of cost. The money already appropriated is enough to go on without further appropriation.

Mr. JONES. Are they sure that is enough money to carry on the work expeditiously?

Mr. LODGE. That is the statement of the department.

Mr. JONES. This dock has been under way now since 1908 or 1909, for five or six years. If the delay has been caused by what the Senator from Virginia suggested a while ago with reference to Norfolk, we ought to make an appropriation so that the work can be carried on rapidly, because, as everybody concedes, this is a very important yard and a very important and necessary dock. I note that there is no appropriation in the bill to carry on the work; and unless there is an abundance of money to carry it on expeditiously, there ought to be some appropriation in the bill. By this amendment we increase the limit of cost, but we do not appropriate any additional money to carry on the work rapidly, which ought to be done, unless we have enough money on hand.

Mr. THORNTON. There are nearly two and a half million dollars on hand now and available to go on with the work.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana, in charge of the bill, how much money has been expended on this dock up to date?

Mr. THORNTON. One million thirty-six thousand three hundred and thirty dollars and one cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 26, after line 13, to insert:

Naval proving ground, Indianhead, Md.: Toward extension of powder factory, $500,000.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I should like to have that amendment go over. I propose to make a point of order against it, which I wish to argue later. I do not care to do it now unless the committee prefers that it shall be done.

Mr. THORNTON. Do I understand that the Senator wishes to make a point of order or to reserve a point of order?

Mr. HUGHES. I propose to make a point of order against the amendment; and inasmuch as the Senate is now considering committee amendments only, I thought I would like to have it go over and revert to it later.

Mr. THORNTON. So far as the committee is concerned, it is quite as willing to have the point of order made now as at any other time.

Mr. HUGHES. I prefer not to make it now. I wish to investigate the hearings a little more thoroughly. There is no particular reason why it should not go over, is there?

Mr. THORNTON. Will the Senator be ready, by the time we finish the other amendments, to take up this one and make his point of order?

Mr. HUGHES. I think so.

Mr. THORNTON. Then I will ask that the amendment be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to refer to this breakwater at Key West and to ask the Senator whether it is purely a naval necessity or whether there are any commercial facilities to be served by it. I am asking simply for information.

Mr. BRYAN rose.

Mr. THORNTON. The Senator from Florida will answer that question.

Mr. BRYAN. In the hearings of last year, Mr. President, there is found a letter from Secretary Meyer, who undertook to explain the necessity for a breakwater at Key West. In his letter he said:

The basin proposed will provide a perfectly safe anchorage under all possible conditions of winds or sea for small vessels, not only of the Navy but of the Army, Lighthouse, Customs, Marine-Hospital, and Revenue Cutter Services. Without a breakwater and the inclosed basin the water front occupied by the several executive departments can not be developed to provide a safe anchorage or berthing space for torpedo craft or light-draft vessels.

The various executive departments of the Government located at Key West are the naval station, the customhouse, and post-office building, located within the naval station; the United States Marine Hospital, the station ship of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and the Weather Bureau.

It is the purpose of the department to build a breakwater for the protection of torpedo boats, which remain in and around Key West almost continually, and for other smaller vessels of the Navy. The man-of-war harbor already accommodates the large battleships; but sometimes they have winds of 80 miles an hour or more, and it is thought that a provision of this character is necessary to protect small craft, otherwise they would be driven ashore. The revenue cutters, it is stated there, are at the mercy of a storm or a hard wind whenever it comes, and it comes quite frequently.

Mr. JONES. Have any of these vessels been driven ashore heretofore?

Mr. BRYAN. Which vessels?

Mr. JONES. These small vessels—revenue cutters, torpedo boats, etc.?

Mr. BRYAN. I do not know, Mr. President, whether any have been driven ashore or not.

Mr. JONES. We have had them there before, have we not?

Mr. BRYAN. I do not know whether any have ever been there during storms or not.

Mr. JONES. Was any special necessity shown for this breakwater, other than what the Senator has read?

Mr. BRYAN. In addition to what Secretary Meyer said, Admiral Stanford appeared before the House committee and said:

The breakwater is absolutely necessary if permanent depth of water is to be obtained—

And for the protection of the craft I have described.

Mr. JONES. It would seem that he bases it largely on the idea of getting a greater depth of water for the larger ships.

Mr. BRYAN. The testimony given by Admiral Stanford was to the effect that, in addition to saving ships from foundering because of the winds that beat upon the island of Key West, the present harbor is so filled up by the washing of the waves that the depth of water in the docks they now have is very much lessened; and the Navy Department has come to the conclusion that there is no way to meet the situation except to provide a breakwater. The breakwater has been partially provided, I think, heretofore; and this is to complete it in order to have a harbor of refuge for these ships, and also to prevent the filling up of the channel immediately adjacent to the Government's property.

Mr. JONES. Is this harbor used to any extent by commercial vessels?

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, certainly—Key West Harbor.

Mr. JONES. Of course I do not know the location of the naval station, whether it is near the commercial docks or not, and whether the harbor that is used in connection with the naval station is really used in a commercial way or not.

Mr. BRYAN. No; the breakwater is not where the commercial vessels land. It is at a different point on the island.

Mr. JONES. So it is purely in connection with the naval station?

Mr. BRYAN. Entirely.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, commercially it would be used only as a harbor of refuge. There is no trade there. It is entirely a naval and military provision.

Mr. JONES. Would it be used by other vessels in case of storms as a harbor of refuge? Would it be available for that purpose?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I have no doubt it would be.

Mr. JONES. Has any strong pressure been brought to bear for a harbor of refuge down there for commercial purposes?

Mr. BRYAN. No; I think not.

Mr. LODGE. It would be only incidental.

Mr. BRYAN. For the Senator's information, I will read from a report of the Navy Department, as follows:

The entire water front of the naval station, including the naval piers already constructed, the Lighthouse Establishment pier, and the Army wharf at Fort Taylor are entirely unprotected from heavy seas from a southerly direction. In fact, these berths are dangerous during heavy weather, except when the wind is blowing from the north to the southeast. During 1909 and 1910 there were two hurricanes when the velocity of the wind reached for a brief time 80 to 100 miles an hour from directions producing the most dangerous conditions to vessels moored or berthed in this locality.

The board believes that further development of the naval station and its adjacent water front should not be undertaken unless a breakwater is constructed to provide a semi-inclosed basin, not only as a protection against heavy seas and hurricane winds but to make it possible to retain the dredge depths at piers along the water front. Under existing conditions storms from a southerly direction carry sand around Fort Taylor, thus rapidly filling in such areas as have already been dredged. Without such a breakwater and inclosed basin the water front occupied by the Navy and by the several executive departments adjacent thereto can not be developed to provide a safe anchorage or berthing space for torpedo craft or light-draft vessels.

The board believes that provision for a breakwater along the lines recommended by the Bureau of Yards and Docks in its letter No. 8587 of November 27, 1912, will meet the needs of the naval service and will provide a safe anchorage under all conditions of wind or sea for small vessels not only for the Navy, but for the Army, Lighthouse, Customs, Marine-Hospital, and Revenue-Cutter Services.

Mr. JONES. Does the committee contemplate further development of this station?

Mr. BRYAN. It is estimated that $600,000 will provide the breakwater.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but I notice that they base that upon the contingency whether or not we will carry on further development of this naval station. That is, they say that if the further development of this naval station is contemplated, then the breakwater is necessary. I desire to know whether the committee contemplates any very great further development of this naval station.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course, I can not say as to that. The committee does not always remain the same and I do not know of course what the department may say hereafter.

Mr. JONES. Does not the Senator think——

Mr. BRYAN. This much is true: No department has ever yet contemplated anything else but the constant improvement and the keeping up of the naval station at Key West. I doubt if any Secretary of the Navy or any general naval board will ever decide to give up the naval station at Key West. Even Secretary Meyer, who advocated the closing of all the other southern navy yards, was very positive in his conviction that it would be necessary to maintain and improve the naval station at Key West.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 23, after "$105,000," to insert "fuel-oil storage, San Francisco Bay, Cal., $100,000"; and, in line 25, after the words "in all," to strike out "$400,000" and insert "$500,000, to be available until expended," so as to make the clause read:

Depots for coal and other fuel: For additional fuel-oil storage at Melville, R. I., $20,000; additional fuel-oil storage at Norfolk, Va., $150,000; fuel-oil storage at San Diego, Cal., $50,000; steel coaling tower at San Diego, Cal., $45,000; fuel-oil storage at Puget Sound, Wash., $105,000; fuel-oil storage, San Francisco Bay, Cal., $100,000; contingent, $30,000; in all, $500,000, to be available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 27, to insert:

Naval disciplinary barracks: For the extension and development of the detention system of reforming and disciplining enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps convicted by general courts-martial to be used as the Secretary of the Navy may direct at naval disciplinary barracks, Port Royal, S. C., and naval disciplinary barracks, navy yard, Puget Sound, Wash., $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 13, on page 27.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the paragraph for repairs and preservation at navy yards and stations. I have been informed, and I supposed the committee would insert——

Mr. THORNTON. Will the Senator please indicate the particular item?

Mr. WEEKS. It is on line 11, page 27. I supposed the committee was going to insert the words "the Naval Observatory" after the word "yards," in line 12. I was so informed. I am told that the accounting officers will not approve bills incurred in repairing roads and for other purposes at the Naval Observatory unless those words are used.

Mr. THORNTON. The suggestion made by the Senator has been looked after by the committee and will come later in the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. The words will be inserted, then, later in the bill?

Mr. THORNTON. That will be done.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 16, after the words "Marine Corps," to strike out "$2,897,000" and insert "$4,140,500," so as to make the clause read:

Total public works, navy yards, naval stations, naval proving grounds, depots for coal and other fuel, Naval Academy, Naval Observatory, and Marine Corps, $4,140,500, and the amounts herein appropriated for public works, except for the Naval Observatory and for repairs and preservation at navy yards and stations, shall be available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," on page 29, line 10, after the word "until," to strike out "June 30, 1916," and insert "expended," so as to make the clause read:

Transportation of remains: To enable the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to cause to be transferred to their homes the remains of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps who die or are killed in action ashore or afloat, and also to enable the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to cause to be transported to their homes the remains of civilian employees who die outside of the continental limits of the United States, $15,000: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated shall be available for payment for transportation of the remains of officers and men who have died while on duty at any time since April 21, 1898, and shall be available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," in the item for pay of the Navy, on page 30, line 13, after the word "with," to strike out "Naval Militia, and for," so as to read:

Pay of enlisted men on the retired list, $359,127; extra pay to men reenlisting under honorable discharge, $964,812; interest on deposits by men, $34,568; pay of petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and apprentice seamen, including men in the engineers' force and men detailed for duty with the Fish Commission, 48,000 men, $23,027,777.40.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item for Pay of the Navy, on page 31, line 3, after the word "fund," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter the number of enlisted men provided for shall be construed to mean the daily average number of enlisted men in the naval service during the fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, after line 6, to insert:

The grade of acting chaplain in the Navy is hereby authorized and created, and hereafter original appointments shall be made by the Secretary of the Navy, not to exceed the number hereinafter provided, in the grade of acting chaplains in the Navy after such examination as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, and while so serving acting chaplains shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant, junior grade, in the Navy. After three years' sea service on board ship each acting chaplain before receiving a commission in the Navy shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy by examination by a board of chaplains and medical officers of the Navy his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the duties of chaplain in the Navy, and if found so qualified shall be commissioned a chaplain in the Navy with the rank of lieutenant, junior grade. If any acting chaplain shall fail on the examinations herein prescribed, he shall be honorably discharged from the naval service, and the appointment of any acting chaplain may be revoked at any time in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Hereafter the total number of chaplains and acting chaplains in the Navy shall be 1 to each 1,250 of the total personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps as fixed by law, including midshipmen, apprentice seamen, and naval prisoners, and of the total number of chaplains and acting chaplains herein authorized 10 per cent thereof shall have the rank of captain in the Navy, 20 per cent the rank of commander, 20 per cent the rank of lieutenant commander, and the remainder to have the rank of lieutenants and lieutenants, junior grade.

Naval chaplains hereafter commissioned from acting chaplains shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant, junior grade, in the Navy until they shall have completed four years' service in that grade, when, subject to examination as above prescribed, they shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant in the Navy, and chaplains with the rank of lieutenant shall have at least four years' service in that grade before promotion to the grade of lieutenant commander, after which service chaplains shall be promoted as vacancies occur to the grades of lieutenant commander, commander, and captain: Provided, That not more than seven acting chaplains shall be commissioned chaplains in any one year: And provided further, That no provision of this section shall operate to reduce the rank, pay, or allowances that would have been received by any person in the Navy except for the passage of this section, and that all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this section be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to line 5 on page 34.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to offer an amendment which I was requested to offer by the chairman of the committee in behalf of the committee. At the end of line 5, on page 34, under the head "Provisions, Navy," I move to insert what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 5, on page 34, insert as a separate paragraph:

Provisions, Navy: The accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow members of the Navy Nurse Corps the amounts which as commutation of subsistence have been at any time checked against their accounts or withheld from them as the result of the decisions of the comptroller dated December 21, 1912, and April 29, 1913, and to pay said sums out of any appropriation for provisions, Navy

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 9, after the word "credited," to insert "until expended," so as to make the clause read:

Those portions of the acts of June 25, 1910, and March 4, 1911, which create the "Naval supply account" under the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, are hereby so modified and amended that hereafter the appraised value of all stores, equipage, and supplies turned in from ships, and ships' equipage turned in from yards or stations (except salvage), shall be credited to the current appropriations concerned, and the amounts so credited shall be available for expenditures for the same purposes as the appropriations credited until expended; and all acts or parts of acts in so far as they conflict with this provision are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Construction and Repair," in the item of appropriation for the construction and repair of vessels, on page 38, line 17, after "$958,100," to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enter into contract for the use by the Government of dry docks at Hunters Point, San Francisco, Cal., one of which docks shall be capable of docking the largest vessel that can be passed through the locks of the Panama Canal, for a period not to exceed six years from completion of such dock, at a compensation of $50,000 per annum during said period of six years, the right of the Government to the use of said docks in time of war to be prior and paramount: Provided, That the construction of the large dock shall be undertaken immediately upon entering into this contract and shall be completed within 24 months thereafter: And provided further, That said contract shall provide for docking rates not in excess of commercial rates, and for such other conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, prior to entering into such contract: And provided further, That in the event, during the said contract period of six years, the necessities of the fleet require the docking of vessels which will necessitate a charge greater than $50,000 per annum, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to have said vessel docked at a rate of charge not greater than price stipulated in said contract.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Steam Engineering," on page 42, line 10, after the word "until," to strike out "June 30, 1916" and insert "expended," so as to make the clause read:

The unobligated and unexpended balances of appropriation "Steam machinery" for the fiscal years 1912 and 1913, not exceeding in amount $250,000, which were made available by the act of March 4, 1913, for the development of a heavy-oil engine for one of the fuel ships provided by that act, shall be considered available for that purpose until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, from line 18, on page 47, to line 6, on page 48, an item relative to the appointment of midshipmen by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. JONES. The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] asked me to request that this amendment be passed over. He was called out of the Chamber temporarily, and I ask that it may go over until he returns.

Mr. THORNTON. Very well; let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over temporarily.

The reading of the bill was continued to the bottom of page 49.

Mr. THORNTON. The Senator from Massachusetts having returned, I ask the Secretary to read the amendment on page 47.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 47, after line 17, the committee report to insert:

Hereafter, in addition to the appointments of midshipmen to the United States Naval Academy as now prescribed by law, the Secretary of the Navy is allowed 25 appointments annually from the enlisted men of the Navy who are citizens of the United States and not more than 22 years of age on the date of entrance to the Naval Academy, and who shall have served not less than two years as enlisted men on the date of entrance: Provided, That such appointments shall be made in the order of merit from candidates who have passed such physical and such competitive mental examinations as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; and candidates so selected shall then be required to pass the physical and mental examinations now required by law for entrance to the Naval Academy.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I reserve a point of order against the amendment to ask the Senator from Louisiana what reasons have been advanced for taking this course.

Mr. THORNTON. I send up two letters to the desk, and I ask that they may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 17, 1914.

Hon. LEMUEL P. PADGETT, M. C.,
Chairman House Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PADGETT: I transmit herewith a proposed bill covering the subject of the appointment of young enlisted men to the Naval Academy. In order to open the appointments up to as many of them as possible, I have deemed it advisable to raise the age of entrance for them to 22 years. Many of them are not much under 20 when enlisted, and a requirement that they should have at least two years' service before appointment is considered advisable. If they were required to serve but a few months or a short period before becoming eligible for appointment to the Naval Academy, many would doubtless enlist with the appointment in view as the main object, and failing to get it would remain in the service dissatisfied or would be insistent upon being discharged.

If this bill should become a law, it is believed that it would have a good influence from every point of view, and would attract a great many young men into the service for one enlistment, during which they would render valuable service and be so trained and educated as to become very valuable as a reserve in case they should not reenlist.

Very respectfully,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Mr. THORNTON. There is another letter sent to the desk, which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 9, 1914.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The Navy bill, as introduced in the House, contained, on pages 44 and 45, lines 15 to 25 and 1 to 3, respectively, a paragraph authorizing the appointment annually of 25 enlisted men as midshipmen in the Navy. This paragraph was struck out on the floor of the House by a point of order.

I am particularly interested in this matter, and am convinced that it would be to the best interests of the service to have these appointments made. In order to open the appointments up to as many of the enlisted men as possible, I have deemed it advisable to raise the age of entrance to 22 years. Many of them are not much under 20 when enlisted; and a requirement that they should have at least two years' service before appointment is considered advisable. If they were required to serve but a few months, or a short period, before becoming eligible for appointment to the Naval Academy, many would doubtless enlist with the appointment in view as the main object, and, failing to get it, would remain in the service dissatisfied, or would be insistent upon being discharged.

If this bill should become law, it is believed that it would have a good influence from every point of view, and would attract a great many young men into the service for one enlistment, during which they would render valuable service and be so trained and educated as to become very valuable as a reserve in case they should not reenlist.

I find that this is a proposition that is very generally favored by all of the line officers of the Navy with whom I have come in contact.

Very respectfully,

VICTOR BLUE,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts make a point of order against the amendment?

Mr. WEEKS. I am going to make a point of order against it, but I should like to make a comment or two before making the point of order.

Mr. President, this is a radical departure in the method of selecting appointees to the Naval Academy for officers in the Navy. It seems to me the method which has been followed in the past has amply answered the purposes of the Government. Appointments are made by the President, Senators, and Representatives either as the result of a competitive examination or from young men who are known to the appointing power and who naturally are selected from the best fitted young men in the community from which they are appointed.

I do not know any objection to continuing the methods which have obtained. If it would increase the effectiveness of the enlisted force I could see some reason why there should be some selections from noncommissioned officers in the service. Indeed, that is the law now. There are young men appointed from warrant grades in the Navy who, after passing an examination, are commissioned as ensigns. So the doors are not entirely closed to enlisted men under present conditions.

It is true that in the Army many men are selected from the ranks for commissions in that service, but I believe it is agreed that on the whole they do not measure up to the graduates from West Point? If that is not a fact, why should we maintain a military academy and a naval academy? And if, on the other hand, those institutions produce better equipped officers than would come from some other source, then why not make the fullest use of them rather than commission officers selected in some other way? If we do not get better officers from our military institutions, then we should not be put to the great expense which we incur in maintaining them, but should abolish the Military and Naval Academies.

I want to have time to investigate this matter further and to have additional testimony to that which has been submitted before I am willing that this shall become a part of the law. I therefore make the point of order that it is new legislation.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I object to debating this question. I do not believe that a point of order can be debated in this way. I yielded when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] rose, because I thought he wished simply to present the reasons why he considered the amendment subject to a point of order, but I should regret to see any extended debate on this question. We want to go on with this bill, and I object to any debate on the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Massachusetts to make a point of order against the item?

Mr. WEEKS. I make a point of order against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. WEEKS. I am quite willing to answer questions, but I think the Senator in charge of the bill has cut off the possibility of any further comment on this provision.

Mr. PAGE. May I ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts at this time? I shall be very brief; I shall take only a minute.

Mr. THORNTON. Very well, Mr. President—one question, and very brief.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, my experience as one who has dealt with the employment and promotion of men has led me to think favorably of this proposal. I believe to-day all of the large concerns that promote men are more inclined than they formerly were to promote from the bottom up, rather than to go outside for new men.

Mr. THORNTON. I do not understand that the Senator from Vermont is asking a question; he is debating and arguing. I beg him to please ask his question.

Mr. PAGE. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he does not believe that that principle carried into the Navy would be as effectual and would be as much an improvement upon naval affairs as it is upon business affairs?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I doubt whether it would be. We commence at the Naval Academy, which is the ground floor of the education of an officer of the Navy, and it does not make much difference whether the boy comes from the farm or comes from the forecastle of a ship, he commences his training as an officer there.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask one question more, with the permission of the Senator from Louisiana, and I will take just a moment.

Mr. THORNTON. Well, Mr. President, I yield once more, though the Senator said he only wanted me to yield once. I will yield to another question, but I shall not yield to still another one.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume the Senator from Vermont may debate this bill, if he wishes to debate it. The Senator from Louisiana has not the control of the debate on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled the amendment in question to be out of order; and it is now in order to read the next committee amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may be heard a moment, I wish to say that it is a great and unalterable privilege of the Senate to debate at great length matters which have been entirely disposed of, and I trust that that immemorial privilege will not be interfered with. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I confess that I asked the privilege of the Senator from Louisiana because I did not wish to be discourteous. I wish to assure him that I only desire to ask a question that will take but a moment, unless the reply of the Senator from Massachusetts shall suggest another, in which case I will omit further questions until the proper time to debate.

Mr. THORNTON. I beg the Senator from Vermont to please ask his question. I wish to say to him that the only object I have in this matter is to get along with this bill.

Mr. PAGE. I appreciate that.

Mr. THORNTON. Otherwise, of course, I would be perfectly willing to have Senators debate the bill ad libitum; but we have to stay here while they are debating.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, as a general principle, if he does not believe that the men of the Navy or the general personnel will be improved if it be understood that men who prove exceptionally faithful and capable will have an opportunity for promotion?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, as I have already said, there is now an opportunity whereby if a man in the service attains a warrant rank he may take an examination, and if he passes that examination he may be commissioned; but, in my judgment, the age limit of this provision is entirely out of reason. A man should be graduated from the Naval Academy at 22 instead of entering at 22. That makes him 4 years too old when he receives his first commission. There are other features of this proposition on which I wish to have further light before I will allow it to become a law.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask that the reading of the bill be proceeded with.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senate is now considering only committee amendments.

Mr. THORNTON. We are now considering committee amendments, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is it the purpose of the Senator from Louisiana to undertake to finish this entire bill this afternoon?

Mr. THORNTON. I should be very glad, indeed, to do so; and in that I think I speak the sentiments of the committee. Of course, it may not be practicable to do so; but we hope that it may be.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then at this time an amendment to the original bill would not be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the head of "Increase of the Navy," on page 56, line 20, after the word "each," to strike out—

One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard; and the Secretary the Navy is hereby authorized to equip such navy yard as he may designate in which the battleship herein authorized is to be built with the necessary building slips and equipment; and the sum of $200,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the navy yard designated by the Secretary of the Navy in which the battleship is to be constructed.

So as to make the clause read:

That for the purpose of further increasing the Naval Establishment of the United States, the President is hereby authorized to have constructed two first-class battleships carrying as heavy armor and as powerful armament as any vessel of their class, to have the highest practicable speed and greatest desirable radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $7,800,000 each.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment modifying the committee amendment just stated by the Secretary.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from New York yield for a question?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not happen to have a copy of the bill before me, but I wish to inquire if the amendment which the Secretary read was not to strike out the provision of the bill which would provide that these battleships shall be built in a Government navy yard?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes; and it is with reference to that amendment that I am offering my amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. There are several Senators who wish to debate that question who are opposed to the amendment, and some of them are not now in the Chamber.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have no objection, with the permission of the chairman of the committee, to letting the amendment go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will go over.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not ask that, Mr. President. Those Senators are not out of the city, and I will suggest the absence of a quorum, so that they may come into the Chamber.

Mr. SWANSON. We will let that matter go over. There is no particular dispute about it, and we can dispose of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I withdraw the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 57, after line 7, to strike out:

One seagoing submarine torpedo boat, to cost not to exceed $1,100,000; and the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, after line 10, to strike out:

Three coast-defense submarine torpedo boats, in an amount not exceeding in the aggregate $1,860,000, and the sum of $525,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose, and the appropriation made in the naval act approved March 4, 1913, "Wrecking pontoon: For construction or purchase of a testing and wrecking pontoon for submarines, to be available until expended, $300,000," is hereby made available for the construction of said submarine boats.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, after line 19, to strike out:

Four submarine boats, in an amount not exceeding in the aggregate $1,500,000, and the sum of $800,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, after line 22, to insert:

Eight or more submarines, one to be of seagoing type, seven or more to be of coast and harbor defense type, to cost not exceeding in the aggregate $4,460,000, and the sum of $1,825,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose, to be available until expended, and the appropriation made in the naval act approved March 4, 1913, "Wrecking pontoon: For construction or purchase of a testing and wrecking pontoon for submarines, to be available until expended, $300,000," is hereby made available until expended for the construction of said submarine boats.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of some member of the committee who is familiar with the subject of seagoing torpedo boats and submarine boats why it is that the majority of such boats are for coast defense? Are the seagoing submarine boats an unquestioned success or are they not? Are they largely experimental so far as their usefulness is concerned?

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I do not think the particular matter referred to by the Senator from Kansas was discussed in the committee. In this matter we were guided by the recommendations of the department.

Mr. BRISTOW. I notice that there is but one seagoing submarine provided for, while there are seven of the coast and harbor defense type, and I was simply asking for information as to what experience has demonstrated, whether the seagoing submarine boat is regarded as a success or whether it is largely experimental?

Mr. SWANSON. Other nations have them; they have been proving a success, and I think they have been a success here. One is all that the department desires at the present time of the seagoing type. The others provided for are for coast and harbor defense. Our coasts and harbors are very improperly defended by submarines. I think submarine boats have passed the experimental stage, including the seagoing type. That is the impression I have derived.

Mr. BRISTOW. It occurs to me that if they are a success we ought to have more than one of them in the Navy.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. LODGE. In the very nature of things, a submarine must be chiefly used in defense and on the coast. The mere fact that the words "harbor defense" are used does not mean that such a boat can not proceed from one point to another, but the very nature of the submarine, of course, requires that it should not be far from land. You can not undertake to go into the open ocean and do much with a submarine; it is not constructed for that purpose. The radius of a seagoing submarine, I think, is not more than two or three hundred miles; I may be wrong about that, but that is the impression I have. I have not asked the department regarding the matter, but I think they do not yet feel that they need a great increase of what are called "sea-going submarines," which are larger and more expensive boats than the ordinary submarines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 58, line 9, before the words "coast-defense," to strike out "The three" and insert "Three of the," so as to make the clause read:

Three of the coast-defense submarine torpedo boats herein authorized shall be built on the Pacific coast: Provided, That the cost of construction on the Pacific coast does not exceed the cost of construction on the Atlantic coast, plus the cost of transportation from the Atlantic to the Pacific; and the Secretary of the Navy is requested to consider the advisability of stationing the four small submarine torpedo boats herein authorized on the coast of the United States in the Gulf of Mexico as a proper naval defense thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 1, after the words "account of," to strike out "building slips and equipment," so as to make the clause read:

Construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and steam machinery of vessels heretofore and herein authorized, to be available until expended, $17,647,617.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to ask the Senator having the bill in charge why the words "building slips and equipment" were stricken from the bill, in line 1, page 59? Doubtless there is some good reason for it.

Mr. THORNTON. I will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that it is because the item is taken care of in another place.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is an entirely satisfactory reply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 59, line 6, after the word "authorized," to insert "to be available until expended," so as to make the clause read:

Increase of the Navy; torpedo boats: On account of submarine torpedo boats heretofore authorized, to be available until expended, $1,685,617.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 10, after the word "authorized," to insert "to be available until expended," so as to make the clause read:

Increase of the Navy; equipment: Toward the completion of equipment outfit of the vessels heretofore and herein authorized, to be available until expended, $421,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 13, after the word "authorized," to insert "to be available until expended," so as to make the clause read:

Increase of the Navy; armor and armament: Toward the armor and armament for vessels heretofore and herein authorized, to be available until expended, $14,877,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is, on page 59, after line 13, to insert——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as I understand the present parliamentary situation, an original amendment would not now be in order, but an amendment to the committee amendment would be in order. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. ASHURST. I move——

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment first be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, after line 13, it is proposed to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to investigate and report at the next regular session of Congress upon the selection of a suitable site for the erection of an armor plant to enable the United States to manufacture its own armor plate and special-treatment steel capable of standing all ballistic and other necessary tests required for use in vessels of the Navy at the lowest possible cost to the Government, taking into consideration all of the elements necessary for the economical and successful operation of such a plant, such as the availability of labor, material, and fuel, and transportation facilities to and from said plant. Said report shall contain the cost of a site sufficient to accommodate a plant having an annual output capacity of 20,000 tons and a site for an output of 10,000 tons, and also an itemized statement of the cost of the necessary buildings, machinery, and accessories for each, and the annual cost and maintenance of each, and the estimated cost of the finished product.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I move that, commencing with——

Mr. THORNTON. I will ask the Senator from Arizona to speak a little louder. He is speaking rather low, and there is a good deal of confusion around.

Mr. ASHURST. I simply say that my amendment, which was offered some two weeks ago and has been printed, purposes to strike out all of lines 14 to 25, inclusive, on page 50, and all of lines 1 to 6, inclusive, on page 60, and insert the following:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to procure by contract armor of the best quality for any or all vessels heretofore or herein provided for, provided such contracts can be made at a price which, in his judgment, is reasonable and equitable; but in case he is unable to make contracts for armor under the above conditions, he is hereby authorized and directed to procure a site for and to erect thereon a factory for the manufacture of armor and gun forgings, and the sum of $4,000,000 is hereby appropriated toward the erection of said factory and the purchase of a site therefor.

Mr. President, the large sum of money named in the amendment might be somewhat alarming at the first blush, but Senators who have been here from the year 1900 will recall that the amendment which I propose is simply, solely, and wholly a rescript of the amendment which was contained in the naval appropriation bill for the year 1900, and which will be found on page 355 of the Navy Yearbook for 1913.

One virtue of my amendment is this: The moral effect of such a statute will cause the armor-plate companies to reduce their prices. Mr. President, it will be remembered that in 1900, when this provision was incorporated into the statute books, the moral effect of the same caused the armor-plate companies to reduce their prices very materially.

This amendment was offered in the House of Representatives when this now pending bill was there. It was offered by Representative TAVENNER, of the State of Illinois, but went out on a point of order. To the amendment which I now propose I wish to address myself for just a few moments.

Mr. President, the Democratic national platform—and I trust Senators will observe that I do not put the soft pedal on "national platform"——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, is he going to discuss the free-tolls provision? [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, no; I am just going to speak for a moment on this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes.

Mr. ASHURST. The Democratic national platform of 1912 declares, inter alia, in favor of the following reforms——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. ASHURST. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. BRYAN. I am not asking the Senator to permit me to interrupt him. I am raising a point of order.

Mr. ASHURST. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. LODGE. A point of order can always be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. The point of order is that the amendment of the Senator from Arizona is out of order, because it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator has not yet offered his amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. I thought he had offered it.

Mr. ASHURST. Not yet.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to move to strike out all on page 59, beginning with line 14.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator moved to strike out and substitute.

Mr. ASHURST. I said that I would do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator to state that he was about to offer an amendment which he had not yet offered. It has not yet been sent up to the desk.

Mr. ASHURST. No; and it will not be sent to the desk until I shall have concluded what I have to say.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to have the Reporter's notes read.

Mr. ASHURST. The Democratic platform provides for the following reforms——

Mr. LODGE. One moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ASHURST. I decline to yield.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to have the notes read, to find out whether or not this matter is in order.

Mr. ASHURST. I decline to yield, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. The Democratic platform provides for the following reforms:

Honesty and rigid economy in the expenditure of public funds and a demand that we return to simplicity and economy.

The platform further declares for—the maintenance of an adequate and well-proportioned Navy, sufficient to defend American policies, protect our citizens, and uphold the integrity and honor of the Nation.

These two declarations are not in conflict with each other. The declarations of the Democratic platform of 1912 and the promises of the Democratic newspapers, magazines, and candidates, that the Democratic Party, if intrusted with power, would economically administer the affairs of government, must be scrupulously kept.

If asked to write a platform and limit it to two words, I should write down the following two: "Lower taxes."

The problem of an adequate Navy is a vast problem and involves the expenditure of large sums of money.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I ask for order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. ASHURST. The American people as a whole desire that we should be in a position to protect our country in the event of a conflict with a foreign power, if such should unfortunately arise; but it does not follow that the American people desire, therefore, to pay extortionate sums of money to an Armor Plate Trust to secure such protection; and the people especially object to paying further tribute to these men, the Armor Plate Trust, whose strong boxes are now plethoric and filled to the bursting point with profits secured from war scares.

On Friday, February 28, 1913, when the Senate had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28812) making appropriations——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I decline to yield.

Mr. BRYAN. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. It is that the Senator from Arizona did offer an amendment. Since the statement by the Chair that the Chair understood the Senator simply to give notice of his intention to offer an amendment, I have ascertained from the Reporter that the Senator from Arizona did offer an amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the reading of the Reporter's notes to settle the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Reporter will read his notes.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as I understand the present parliamentary situation, an original amendment would not now be in order, but an amendment to the committee amendment would be in order. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. ASHURST. I move to strike out——

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment first be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Secretary stated the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I move that, commencing with line 14, page 59, all of lines 14, 15, 16——

Mr. THORNTON. I will ask the Senator from Arizona to speak a little louder; he speaks rather low, and there is a good deal of confusion around.

Mr. ASHURST. I simply say that my amendment—it was offered some two weeks ago, and has been printed—purposes to strike out all of lines 14 to 25, inclusive, on page 59, and all of line 1 to line 6, on page 60. I think I shall read the amendment. Strike out all I have indicated and insert the following.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator twice stated that he moved the amendment, and then said: "I think I shall read the amendment."

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator from Arizona has offered an amendment proposing to strike out and insert. Upon that I raise the point of order that it is general legislation upon an appropriation bill. The point of order is not subject to debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks, upon having the notes read, that the point of order is well taken. The Chair will state that he had the impression that the Senator was simply reading in advance what he proposed to offer; but, according to the reading of the Reporter's notes, the amendment is now pending and is subject to a point of order.

Mr. ASHURST. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. BRYAN. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is ruled out on a point of order.

Mr. OLIVER. I make the same point of order against the committee amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it may be parliamentarily proper for my friend from the State of Florida to try to take me off the floor, but I will say that I am a man of more resolution than to be swept off the floor in this way. He is not going to deprive me of the right to be heard on this question, and I regret——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I decline to yield. I shall make this speech, and if the Senator does not see fit to listen to it, he can flee precipitately to the cloakroom.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator has his rights. He can appeal from the decision of the Chair, and then take the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not care to appeal. The amendment is obnoxious to a point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Chair has not decided, has he, that the committee amendment is out of order? It is just the amendment of the Senator from Arizona, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. The Chair has not decided any of them to be out of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that the Chair has decided that the amendment of the Senator from Arizona is out of order, but he has not decided the point made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], that the committee amendment is out of order. The Senator from Arizona would have a right to discuss the amendment of the committee unless it was held out of order, would he not?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, Mr. President. I desire to address myself to the committee amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like a ruling on my point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be compelled to rule that the committee amendment is also out of order.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the interruptions to which I have been subjected require that I restate a part of what I said in the commencement of my remarks.

It was my intention to propose an amendment to this bill which would provide that the Secretary of the Navy should have the power to make contracts for the purchase of armor plate, and that if the contracts were exorbitant, or the price paid too high, then and in such event the Secretary of the Navy would be authorized and empowered to construct an armor-plate factory. In other words, I purposed introducing an amendment which was an exact rescript of the paragraph found in the naval appropriation bill of 1900, to wit, on page 355 of the Navy Yearbook, known as Senate Document 247, Sixty-third Congress, second session.

I find no particular fault with the amendment proposed by the committee. It provides, however, for an investigation, and we have had a sufficient number of investigations already.

The amendment is better than nothing, but I am not much given to compromises. If you compromise, you run the risk of losing that to which you are entitled; and if we compromise away the right of the people and fail to stop the Armor Plate Trust from picking the people's pockets, their pockets will be picked all the more the longer we compromise.

The amendment proposed by the committee is salutary, it is wise; but it is not so good as the amendment which I propose. I will say that I had no more expectation of my amendment becoming a part of this law than I have of reaching up and drawing down part of the revolving fan above me, for reasons obvious at least to me, if not to others, the reasons being that many Senators abler than I, of more experience than I, and just as patriotic as I, take the view that it is not wise, expedient, just, nor proper for the Government to enter into the business of manufacturing armor plate or anything else.

With those Senators I have no quarrel. They have the moral and legal right to make their arguments, and I have the right, and shall exercise it, to make my argument in favor of my proposition.

I see that the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has entered the Chamber. Having read of the great struggle that he carried on some seven or eight years ago to have a hearing in this Chamber in behalf of principles he believed to be wise, I emulate his example, and shall continue to speak in behalf of what I think is right; and the puny efforts of Senators to sweep me off the floor will be disregarded as idle wind that passes by and that I regard not.

As I was about to say, the Democratic national platform of 1912 declares, inter alia, in favor of the following reforms——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I ask for order in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER rapped with his gavel.

Mr. ASHURST (reading)—

Honesty and rigid economy in the expenditure of public funds and a demand that we return to simplicity and economy.

The platform further declares for—

The maintenance of an adequate and well-proportioned Navy, sufficient to defend American policies, protect our citizens, and uphold the integrity and honor of the Nation.

These two declarations are not in conflict with each other. The declarations of the Democratic platform of 1912 and the promises of the Democratic newspapers, magazines, and candidates, that the Democratic Party, if intrusted with power, would economically administer the affairs of Government, must be scrupulously kept.

If asked to write a platform and limit it to two words, I should write down the following two: "Lower taxes."

The problem of an adequate Navy is a vast problem and involves the expenditure of large sums of money. The American people, as a whole, desire that we should be in a position to protect our country in the event a conflict with a foreign power unfortunately should arise; but it does not follow that the American people desire, therefore, to pay extortionate sums of money to an armor-plate trust to secure such protection; and the people especially object to paying further tribute to those men whose strong boxes are plethoric and filled to the bursting point with profits secured from war scares.

On Friday, February 28, 1913, when the Senate had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28812) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, the following proceedings were had:

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

"Increase of the Navy: armor and armament: Toward the armor and armament for vessels heretofore and herein authorized, to be available until expended, $11,508,300."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I desire to propose an amendment at that particular point, which I now send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, line 7, after the numerals, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall forward to Congress at the earliest practicable date a full report of all bids received by him relating to the purchase of armor, ship plates, and structural steel for the battleship or dreadnaught purported to be named, when completed, the Pennsylvania, and that the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed not to award any contract for the purchase of steel, armament, armor, or ship plates until further directed by Congress."

Mr. President, at that time I spoke in support of my amendment as follows:

Mr. ASHURST. I purpose that the amendment shall be retroactive in character and that it shall relate to the bids which were opened about 10 days ago by the Secretary of the Navy. * * *

I might say that the amendment I proposed there went out on a point of order made by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

I further said:

The Armor Plate Trust is composed of the Carnegie Steel Co., of Homestead, Pa., subsidiary of the United States Steel Co.; the Bethlehem Iron & Steel Co., of Bethlehem, Pa.; and the Midvale Steel Co., of Philadelphia, Pa.

Bids were opened about 10 days ago—

Mark you, I was speaking then on the 28th day of February, 1913—by the Secretary of the Navy for approximately 8,000 tons of armor plate for the dreadnaught Pennsylvania. These companies mentioned above were represented here by President Dinkey, of the Carnegie Co.; Vice President Johnston, of the Bethlehem Co.; and Vice President Petrie, of the Midvale Co. These gentlemen were frequently in conference. As a consequence, when the bids were opened it occasioned no surprise to find that the bids did not vary a dollar a ton between the three companies and that the bids were, in fact, $25 a ton more than the price received by these companies on the last previous contract. In view of this apparent collusion of these three companies, comprising the Armor Plate Trust, it is inadvisable that the contract should be awarded without investigation.

The point of order made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts prevented an investigation, of course.

As it requires about three years to build a battleship, armor plate will not be needed for at least a year, and therefore no harm can come from a delay of a few weeks until this matter can be investigated.

Mr. President, I repeat, the amendment went out on a point of order.

I introduced this amendment in view of the apparent collusion of these companies, which companies, I might add, comprise the Armor Plate Trust, as it certainly seemed inadvisable that the contract should be awarded without some investigation, especially in view of the fact that it requires about three or four years to construct a battleship, and the armor plate for these ships would not be required for nearly a year. It seemed obvious that no harm could come by a delay of a few weeks until the matter could be investigated. But a point of order was made against the amendment I proposed, which point of order was sustained by the then presiding officer.

I do not especially complain about the ruling of the Chair, as I have some doubt as to whether the amendment was cognizable under the rules at that time, and I find no fault with the rule, although in that particular case it happened to defeat a wholesale modification in the proposed law. Notwithstanding the intimation made on the floor of the Senate that there was apparent collusion among the three pretending competitors, and notwithstanding the complaint that the bids were about $34 per ton higher than the price received for armor plate on the last previous contract, the then Secretary of the Navy, in the expiring hours of a defeated, not to say discredited, administration, accepted the bids, and on the 3d day of March, 1913, let the contract by dividing, for all practical purposes, the 8,000 tons of armor plate among the three companies pretending to be competitors. Without further emphasizing the unexplained and peculiar haste on the part of the retiring Secretary of the Navy to facilitate these companies comprising the Steel Trust——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. REED. Could the Senator state what was the aggregate amount the Government was mulcted by that?

Mr. ASHURST. Exactly $1,600,000.

Mr. REED. Who was Secretary of the Navy at that time?

Mr. ASHURST. The Secretary whose term of office expired March 3, 1913.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Von Meyer.

Mr. ASHURST. Von Meyer was the Secretary, the predecessor of the present Secretary. The result of letting such contracts was and is that this Government, if the contract shall be enforced, will be required to pay $454 per ton for class A armor plate when heretofore this Government has never paid a higher price than $420 per ton for class A armor plate.

But, Mr. President, the apparent collusion among the pretended competitors and the additional $34 per ton to be paid by this Government for the armor plate are not the only facts relating to that transaction which should be exhibited to the Senate and the country.

On March 17, 1913, I introduced the following resolution in the Senate:

Whereas bids were opened by the Secretary of the Navy in February, 1913, for furnishing armor plate of the dreadnaught Pennsylvania; and

Whereas the representatives of three firms manufacturing armor plate in the State of Pennsylvania, while pretending to bid as competitors, after a conference submitted bids which did not vary more than $1 per ton; and

Whereas the then Secretary of the Navy, notwithstanding an intimation made on the floor of the Senate of the United States that it was alleged there existed collusion among different manufacturers to advance the price of armor plate and divide the profits of the contract, awarded the contract on March 3, 1913, by dividing, for all practical purposes, the award of 8,000 tons of armor plate among the three companies; and

Whereas it is alleged that this action of the said firms reveals that they comprise an Armor Plate Trust, and that the price named in the contract awarded by the Secretary of the Navy is in the neighborhood of about $25 per ton higher than the previous awards by the Department of the Navy for armor plate: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to forward to the Senate at as early a date as practicable a report on the amount of armor plate ordered by the Department of the Navy during the past 25 years, the prices paid in each award, and the names of the firms or corporations to whom the contracts were awarded.

On May 22, 1913, I introduced S. 2308, to provide for the erection of an armor-plate factory, and in support thereof spoke in part as follows:

Mr. ASHURST. * * * By introducing this bill I am not pioneering any new movement or attempting to bring to the notice of Congress a subject with which Congress is unfamiliar, but I am simply endeavoring to put into law the concrete result of the valuable public services respecting this subject that were performed by a Senate committee in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

It has been a pleasant task for me to read the tomes that make up the Senate reports and to find that in the early part of January, 1896, the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs had before it and considered a bill of which the one I have just introduced is almost a rescript. It is with peculiar pleasure I find that the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon] and the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]— were then, as now, engaged in rendering patriotic and valuable services to their country. I find that the committee which then considered the subject of the erection of an armor-plate factory was comprised of Senators Cameron (chairman), Hale, Perkins, McMillan, Chandler, Bacon, and Tillman. That committee, in addition to considering the bill for the erection of an armor-plate factory, had before it a resolution, agreed to on December 31, 1895, which, among other things, directed the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire whether prices paid or agreed to be paid for armor for vessels of the Navy were fair and reasonable.

I was speaking then on May 22, 1913—

On January 18, 1896, the committee began investigation by receiving a statement made in person by the then Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Hilary A. Herbert. Testimony was also taken from various sources, and hearings were granted to the Bethlehem Iron Co. and the Carnegie Steel Co. Owing to the rapid progress of Congress in dispatching its business it was found impossible to conclude the inquiry and make a written report at the close of the session. During the recess of Congress the Secretary of the Navy proceeded to obtain information upon which to make conclusions necessary to enable him to form an opinion upon the question as to what was a fair price for armor. The committee made its report on February 11, 1897, and the testimony adduced and the statements made at the hearings were printed. No one may read the report of that committee and the testimony adduced at the hearings and fail to reach the conclusion that it is wise and salutary, indeed necessary, to establish a Government armor-plate factory.

Indeed, Mr. President, the fifth recommendation of the committee reads as follows:

"That a Government armor-plate factory could be erected for the sum of $1,500,000, and that it is expedient to establish such a factory in case the armor manufacturers decline to accept such prices for armor as may be fixed by law."

At the hearings before the committee naval officers made statements to the effect that armor plate could be furnished for $250 per ton. Among others, Lieut. Commander John A. Rogers stated:

"I am of the opinion that the average cost of labor and materials will not be more than $250 per ton of armor."

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me that the Government of the United States should proceed to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor plate, and in so doing it could free itself from the graspings and extortions of the Steel Trust, and I repeat that in these hearings that were had before the Naval Committee in 1896 it was demonstrated that this Government could manufacture armor plate at about one-half of the price charged by these companies that pretend to compete but in truth are in collusion and are not competitors at all.

* * * * * * *

[Senate Reports, vol. 2, 54th Cong., 2d sess., 1896–97].

"Conclusion of Secretary Herbert in his report of January 5, 1897, says: The Secretary called together a board composed of Lieuts. Karl Rohver, Kossuth Niles, and A. A. Ackerman, two of whom had been inspectors of armor at the Bethlehem Co.'s Iron Works; the other, Lieut. Ackerman, had been connected with the manufacture and use of steel in its different forms for a number of years, during which time he had spent several months at both the Bethlehem and Carnegie Works. These gentlemen made an exhaustive report upon the cost of labor and material entering into a ton of armor, showing in detail every little item, beginning with the cost of the several ingredients charged in the furnace for casting the ingot preparatory to the forging process and ending with the work on the finished plate. The result of their calculations was that the cost of the labor and material in a ton of single-forged Harveyed nickel steel armor, the Government supplying the nickel (nickel at $20 per ton), was $167.30.

* * * * * * *

"Lieut. Commander Rodgers, who had been an inspector at Bethlehem Iron Works, was called upon to make an estimate of the cost of manufacturing armor, and his report, based upon observation in the manufacture of armor, makes the cost of labor and material in a ton of single-forged Harveyed nickel steel armor $178.59.

* * * * * * *

"The inspector of ordnance at the Carnegie Steel Co., Ensign C. B. McVay, was also called upon for an estimate, and his report, though made separately without consultation with the other officers, is that the labor and material in a ton of single-forged Harveyized nickel steel armor is $161.54.

* * * * * * *

"Average for single forged of above estimate is $185.38, and $197.78 for reforged armor."

Mr. President, on July 12, 1913, the honorable Secretary of the Navy transmitted to the Senate a letter, in response to a resolution of the Senate adopted on May 27, 1913, requesting information with reference to the cost of armor plate and its manufacture. The letter of the honorable Secretary was a very comprehensive report and evidenced the fact that the Navy Department was fully aware of the injustice to our Government being committed by the Armor Plate Trust.

I shall now read the Secretary's report made on this subject. This report is not the shouting of a wild demagogue.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator appears to apply his remarks to me, and the Senator will not allow me to interrupt him.

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRYAN. I wish to say that the Senator is very badly mistaken. I did not raise a point of order that would prevent the erection by the Government of an armor-plate factory. The Senator from Arizona himself introduced here a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to give information as to what an armor-plate factory would cost. The Secretary of the Navy is unable so far to give the information asked for in that resolution, and it had been asked for on previous occasions.

It is for that reason that the Secretary himself suggested the amendment, which appears in italics on pages 59 and 60, which the Senator from Arizona himself moved to strike out. I undertake to say that the Committee on Naval Affairs is not subject to the charge the Senator from Arizona seems to have in mind, that we are trying to further the interests of any manufacturers of armor plate.

Mr. President, the Secretary of the Navy himself says that the amount of money provided by the amendment which the Senator from Arizona offered this afternoon, $4,000,000, would be insufficient to furnish armor plate for half of one battleship, and that in order to have a two-battleship program to manufacture our own armor plate we would have to build a plant costing $17,000,000, or approximately that. The Secretary is unable yet to state whether it ought to be done or not, but he wants this committee amendment so that he may investigate further and inform the Senate.

I say, when the Senate committee, in pursuance of the Senator's own resolution and at the request of the Secretary of the Navy, incorporates an amendment into the bill, and then the Senator who introduced the resolution which originated that information and that amendment by the Senate committee moves to strike it out, I do not know how he can attack the committee. The committee is proposing to do the very thing the Secretary asked to have done in order that he may make an investigation before we build an armor-plate factory instead of investigating whether it could be done after the money has been appropriated.

Mr. ASHURST. I have not charged that the Senate committee or any Senator has done anything for the specific purpose of encouraging the Armor Plate Trust or enlarging its profits. I have simply made the observation that the striking out of my amendment on the point of order raised by the Senator would have that effect, innocently, however, of course.

Mr. BRYAN. Does not the Senator realize that the Secretary of the Navy states from the best information he can obtain that in order to erect an armor-plate factory to build two battleships a year would require an appropriation of about $17,000,000 in addition to the site? The Senator in his amendment provides for only $4,000,000. Can the Senator criticize the committee for reporting an amendment giving to the Secretary of the Navy the right and the full power to make an investigation, to look into the books of the companies, in order to ascertain the facts?

Mr. ASHURST. The amendment I propose carries that power. Let me read it again.

Mr. BRYAN. But the Senator's amendment does not appropriate enough money to furnish armor for one battleship.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the Senator's opinion.

Mr. BRYAN. That is the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy. I have no opinion about it.

Mr. ASHURST. My opinion is that the sum of $4,000,000 is sufficient.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the Senator what he thinks of this statement which I read from the report of the Secretary of the Navy:

> The cost of a plant capable of turning out 10,000 tons a year, which is about half of the armor needed on a two-battleship program, is estimated by the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance at $8,466,000, and the cost of the armor at $314 a ton.

Skipping some, I read further:

> On 10,000 tons the Government would save $1,400,000 per annum.

Now, he says further:

> In the case of the 20,000-ton plant, which it is estimated can produce armor at $279 a ton, the net saving is $3,048,462.24.

If you erect a plant costing $17,000,000, the Secretary estimates that you can save $3,000,000 a year, but the Secretary is of the opinion that in order to provide enough armor plate to construct one ship a year we would need to expend for the factory alone $8,500,000. That is the best information we have been able to get. Yet the Secretary is not willing to act upon the information so far obtained by him, and he asked the committee to authorize him by an amendment to proceed to get that information, and that is what the committee did.

The Senator from Arizona says that anyone who raises the point of order upon an amendment which proposes to spend $4,000,000, which is claimed by the department to be a useless expenditure, is acting in behalf of the armor-plate factories. The Senator knows the point of order that will be raised. He knows that it has been raised all the time. If the Senator from Arizona has information sufficient to lead him to believe that we can build an armor-plate factory for $4,000,000, and that the information of the Navy Department that it will cost $17,000,000 is wrong, why does not the Senator introduce a bill which is not subject to a point of order and prove to the Senate and save $3,000,000 by the expenditure of $4,000,000?

Mr. ASHURST. I have introduced a bill which is sleeping now in your committee, which proposes to appropriate the sum of $1,600,000 to begin the construction of an armor-plate factory.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the Senator think that will be sufficient?

Mr. ASHURST. My dear Senator, do I think that will be sufficient with which to begin? Did you hear what I said a moment ago? In 1896 the Senate committee investigated, and paragraph 5 of its findings was as follows:

> That a Government armor-plate factory can be erected for the sum of $1,500,000.

Mr. BRYAN. On what date was that report?

Mr. ASHURST. 1897. Assuming that it is double that amount and that it will cost $3,000,000 to build a factory——

Mr. BRYAN. Why does the Senator make that contention when the Secretary advised Congress in reply to his own resolution that to build and turn out 10,000 tons a year would cost $8,466,000? Surely the Secretary had that information.

Mr. ASHURST. I will now read from the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy for the fiscal year 1913, in which he recommends the construction of an armor-plate factory. I will begin on page 8 of the report; this is the report for the fiscal year 1913, submitted to the Senate and printed under the order of the Senate:

IMPORTANCE OF ARMOR-PLATE FACTORY.

I desire to recommend the passage at the earliest moment of a sufficient appropriation to begin the construction of a Government armor plant to relieve a situation which, in my estimation, is intolerable and at total variance with the principle of economy in spending Government money. It is not my intention to enlarge here upon the economic reasons that prompt me to make this recommendation, as I have already gone into them at length in a letter to the Senate in response to a request for information and which I add to this report as an appendix. It is sufficient to mention here that only three firms in this country can manufacture armor plate, and that these firms have put in bids for armor plate seldom varying over a few dollars, and in many instances being identical to a cent. Asked for reasons as to the uniformity of these bids, two of the firms replied frankly that as the contract would be divided amongst them anyway, the only effect of competitive bids would be to reduce the profits made by all of the three firms.

The department has made every effort to secure real competition and reasonable prices, even to the extent of withholding awards until the necessity of building battleship No. 39, since called the Pennsylvania, I believe, made it imperative that action be taken. After long negotiations the best efforts of the department resulted in securing a saving of $111,875, by new "competitive" bids, a purely nominal competition, inasmuch as the successful bidder proposes to divide up the work with his rivals.

I merely wish to interpolate long enough to say, and I said it in the beginning of my remarks, that the amendment proposed by the committee was salutary—in fact, a good amendment; but we have had enough investigation; we have spent thousands upon thousands of dollars in investigating—I simply propose to change the amendment, because we had all the facts that we can procure, anyway, and provide an appropriation for the commencement, at least, if not for the entire construction, of the plant.

I wish again to emphasize the fact that what I have said must not be construed as a reflection upon the capability or the integrity of the committee. Senators have a right to argue facts without having their remarks construed as reflections upon the capabilities or the patriotism of other Senators.

This saving, while well worth the time it took to secure it, is after all very small as compared with the total cost of the armor. Prices charged by these firms for armor have been investigated by Congress a number of times and by special boards of experts, and in every case the investigators have reported that the prices charged are greatly in excess of the cost of manufacture. With the desire to be just, the Secretary offered to transmit to Congress any figures these companies cared to submit to show that their prices were reasonable, but they have refused to present the absolutely necessary data to the Secretary unless he would agree to accept it as confidential, which, of course, means that he would not allow Congress to analyze the figures.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Arizona know why, when we are engaged in investigating almost everything on earth, somebody has not proposed to empower a committee of Congress to investigate and find out what it does cost to make armor plate?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, that is the very purpose of the committee amendment; but the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] assumes that he already knows what it will take to make armor plate, and what ought to be spent he wants to appropriate in this bill. That is the difference. The Secretary of the Navy says he does not know and that his department does not know.

Mr. REED. What is it that it is proposed to investigate?

Mr. BRYAN. The proposition is to have the Secretary of the Navy make a complete investigation.

Mr. REED. But if the armor-plate concerns refuse to furnish the information?

Mr. BRYAN. But they have not refused.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator from Arizona to say that they refused to furnish the information unless it was considered confidential.

Mr. ASHURST. Exactly.

Mr. BRYAN. If the report presented to the House is confidential, I am surprised to know that we have this complete statement from the Secretary of the Navy, dated June 28, 1911, in which he states that the estimated cost of an armor plant, with a capacity of 20,000 tons annually, is $11,288,431, and that would build two battleships.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Florida misapprehends me.

Mr. BRYAN. A plant with a capacity of 10,000 tons of armor would cost $8,466,000, and that would build one battleship. The Senator from Arizona says we could buy a site and build a factory for $4,000,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Florida; but that was not the inquiry I was pursuing.

Mr. BRYAN. I understand the Senator's inquiry. Then, the Secretary of the Navy proceeds to say that, from the best information the department has, it costs $279 a ton on 20,000 tons. In an armor plant with a capacity of 10,000 tons the armor will cost $314 a ton; in a plant with 5,000 tons capacity the armor would cost $354 per ton.

It is also stated:

(d) The estimated cost of manufacturing the best armor plate per ton (Senate resolution) is $269. This is the estimated cost at a well-equipped private plant and includes all elements of cost except interest on investment. If the latter is considered to be a legitimate charge on the cost of armor plate, the sum of $49 should be added to the foregoing, making a total cost of $318 per ton.

The Secretary says that is his best information; but he is not yet satisfied, and he has asked for authority to investigate, to go into these armor-plate factories and to examine the books of the companies to see what it costs to manufacture armor plate, so that he can come back to Congress and tell us at the next session. That is the amendment which the committee recommends. The Senator from Arizona moves to strike that out and to appropriate $4,000,000 to buy a site, to erect a factory, and to proceed to the manufacture of armor plate.

Mr. REED. That throws some light upon the matter about which I was inquiring. Of course, as to these armor-plate factories, if they refused to furnish the information to the Secretary of the Navy and he was without authority to compel the information, it would appear that Congress or somebody having authority ought to direct an investigation. That was the matter about which I was inquiring. I now understand from the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] that the committee has undertaken to reach that result by the passage of a law giving the Secretary of the Navy the right to make the investigation.

Mr. BRYAN. I want the Senator from Missouri to know that the committee has adopted the amendment sent to them by the Navy Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think a part of the mutual misunderstanding of Senators grows out of their failure to remember what I think happened in this case. What the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] was reading from a few moments ago was as far back as 1896. Subsequently to that date there was a congressional investigation of this very question by a Senate committee. That was at a time when prices were different from what they now are. So the answer to the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], as to why somebody has not introduced a resolution to investigate the matter, is that somebody did introduce such a resolution, that it was passed, and that such an investigation was had.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. I will say that in my investigation of this question—I put in some months on it—I found a very illuminating speech made some years ago by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], in which he pointed out the injustice that these manufacturers had perpetrated upon this Government and their extortionate charges. I was led to conclude that we have had four or five investigations; we have had at least three; and while I do not now object to an investigation, for it would be salutary, but not as salutary as the erection of an armor-plate factory by the Government itself——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is one point there which I ask the Senator from Arizona to remember. The provision of the Senate committee, which a moment ago went out on a point of order——

Mr. ASHURST. I am very sorry it did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Involved not only an investigation as to the price of making the armor plate, but the selection and purchase of a site that shall be convenient for its manufacture.

While upon this question, if the Senator from Arizona will pardon me a moment longer, in pursuance of what he has just said, I will repeat that this is no new question at all, as the Senator himself has said. I, myself, at the other end of the Capitol, and a great many others dealt with it 10 or 12 or 14 years ago—I do not remember how long ago—first, I believe, in the Fifty-fourth Congress, when Mr. Herbert was Secretary of the Navy—and at succeeding intervals very many times. There is no doubt about the fact of robbery; there has never been any doubt about it; the Government has been cruelly robbed in the prices, which it has been forced by conspiracy to pay; and there is equally no doubt about the right remedy; and that right remedy is that the Government of the United States should manufacture armor.

The general principle which leads good Democrats to believe that governments should not go into private business as competitors with citizens in industrial enterprises does not apply in a case like this. The Government as much as anybody else has a right to make a thing for its own use, especially when by the very nature of the case, as in this instance, real competition among those who alone make and sell to it can not exist; that is not competing with private industry in any illegitimate manner at all. It is an inherent right of the consumer just as my weaving the cloth and cutting out of it a suit of clothes for myself would be. So much for that.

While about it I want to express the hope that the Committee on Naval Affairs will report a separate bill on this subject, and that that bill will go further than this committee amendment, though the amendment is in itself excellent; that the bill will contain the language of this amendment, and also carry an appropriation of not to exceed, say, $9,000,000, placed at the behest of the Secretary of the Navy to use in the purchase of a site, the erection of a factory, and the construction of armor plate as the construction of battleships goes on and as the work may demand.

I want to add that there is a reason outside of preventing glaring and accustomed robbery for it; there is a reason greater than the robbery, which is a mere money reason after all. Armor-plate makers and makers of munitions of war all the world over are a part of that great, invisible empire of influences which make for war and against peace. They are the stirrers up of the constant reports and rumors spread broadcast just prior to appropriations by legislatures in every nation of this world of "approaching warfare." An instance was brought out in Germany in the case of the Krupps, the greatest manufacturers in the world of armor plate and of guns and munitions of war of every description. It was proven that out of their secret funds they had employed men in Paris to excite the French people with a fear of a war with Germany, so that the amount of appropriations of the Corps du Legislatif for the purchase of munitions of war of every description might be increased, and at Berlin they had also men upon their list "accelerating public opinion," as some fellow in New York once called it, to excite the German people about the "hostile intentions" of France. Although we have not had the proof of the existence of the same sort of thing in Washington which has been proven and admitted to have existed in Paris and in Berlin, I myself do not doubt for one moment that it has existed here and that the "war scares" that come up every time a Naval or Army appropriation bill is pending is attributable to such sources.

We have missed it this year because they did not need it; we have trouble enough in Mexico to answer their purposes, but on all previous occasions these war scares have come up just prior to the passage of the Army and the naval appropriation bills. Mysterious rumors about the evil intentions of foreign Governments have been circulated. Japan has been the chief power exploited in this country. Of course, in Germany France was, in Austria Russia was, and in France Germany was, and then, the old French and German material having given out, they started a new war scare, when, by vague rumors, all Great Britain was on the verge of hysterics about a possible war with Germany, owing to the mean, bad, conspiring "militaristic" army and navy and Government of Germany, which was getting ready to sweep her trade by force from the seas.

I do not mind the money so much, but I would like to deprive the war influences of this world of one of their greatest and most influential allies. This would be done just in proportion as the hopes for private and pecuniary profit from war was extinguished. Of course the Chair ruled perfectly proper; the Chair could do nothing else—but I hope that the committee will bring in, and that we will pass at the first opportunity, a separate bill which will not be subject to a point of order, and which will contain language similar to that contained in the amendment providing for all necessary investigation as to site and cost, and so forth, and go further and say that if the Secretary of the Navy concludes that it is an advisable thing to do, then, "there is hereby appropriated a sum not to exceed $10,000,000." That will provide for at least one factory, which will be capable of turning out enough armor for one battleship, and will leave us at the mercy of these people for only another battleship, or an armor plant might be constructed on such a plan as could, at the very first, make the armor for one battleship, and by extensions of the plan from year to year its product could be gradually increased to the amount necessary for two or for three battleships.

I beg pardon of the Senator from Arizona. I did not intend, when I got on my feet, to go into all that, but the Senator referred to what happened in the House and my part in it. I thought of pursuing the line suggested by him as much further as I have pursued it.

Mr. ASHURST. So far from asking my pardon, I want to thank the Senator from Mississippi for the valuable contribution he has made to my poor speech.

Mr. President, I shall proceed as rapidly as possible and shall conclude in a very few moments. I was reading, it will be remembered, from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, who says:

> Confidential information about public expenditures was not desired and was not accepted. It is evident that without an armor plant of its own the Government in time of war or impending war would be entirely at the mercy of these three manufacturers and obliged to pay practically whatever price they asked. History does not warrant an assumption that the patriotism of these companies would prove superior to their desire for profits, inasmuch as during the time that war with Spain was imminent, these companies refused to accept the price fixed by Congress, after investigation, as a just rate, and declined to manufacture any armor until they got their own price of $100 a ton more than that which Congress had determined on. In this connection it is well to note that the love of country possessed by these companies did not prevent them from furnishing armor to Russia, as reported to Congress, in 1894 at $249 a ton, while they were charging the United States $616.14 a ton upon purchases under the contract of March, 1893, nor did it hinder them from furnishing armor to Italy in 1911 at $395.03 a ton, while they were charging their own Government $420 a ton, and that even at the present day, according to information that seems reliable, they are furnishing the armor for the Haruna, now being built by the Kawasaki Co. at Kobe for Japan, at $406.35 a ton, as against the price, ranging from $504 to $440 a ton, which they are now charging us for the armor of battleship No. 39.

The honorable Secretary proceeds:

> I am convinced from the reports made to me by experts who have gone carefully over the subject that we can make armor much cheaper than we now buy it, and that, from an economic point of view alone, the erection of a Government plant is amply justified. By manufacturing armor plate in its own plant the Government will be able to keep for its own use any improvements in the manufacture or composition of its armor that may be developed. The last word has not been said in armor, and past history shows that great improvements in the manufacture and design of armor plate have been made. The greater part of these improvements were suggested by actual experience gained by naval officers. Under our present system of obtaining our armor plate from private companies such improvements become the property of all the world, and can be obtained by anybody who cares to buy them. Even now the improvements in armor and the designs worked out by the Navy have been embodied in the warship of another nation recently finished by the Bethlehem Steel Co. and put into commission.
> This is not an argument lightly to be disregarded in favor of a Government armor plant, nor has it been overlooked, for instance, by Japan, which has erected its own armor-making plant and surrounded it with such secrecy that none of the other nations are able to tell whether or not at this minute the Japanese armor may not be superior to any other in existence. In addition to Japan, the French Government, after experimenting with a factory capable of producing only the lighter weights of armor, is enlarging its Government plant so as to permit of the production of thick plates, and Russia has had its own armor-plate factory for some time. In England the extortions of what is described in the English papers as the "armor ring," for there is every reason to believe that the agreement to maintain high prices among manufacturers is international, has resulted in agitation for a Government plant for that country which will probably be brought about in the next few years.
> As mentioned in my letter to the Senate, taking the highest estimate which has been submitted to me by the experts of the Bureau of Ordnance as the probable total cost price of Government-made armor, the Government can achieve a saving by the erection of a 10,000-ton-a-year plant of $1,061,360 per annum—

A saving each year of $1,061,360—> after deducting 4 per cent as interest on the money used in erection and installation of plant, and $3,048,462 a year on the basis of a Government plant capable of producing 20,000 tons a year. If these figures are correct, as I believe them to be, and as Congress can easily ascertain for itself, I do not see how it is possible for Congress to justify to the people a refusal to erect a Government plant, nor how it can answer the charge that will invariably be brought up—that the same mysterious providence which saved this profitable business to the steel companies three times in the past, even after money for a Government plant had actually been appropriated, is not still at work exercising its beneficent protection over those lusty specimens of infant industries, who are even now under Government investigation as violators of the antitrust law.

Mr. President, it would seem unnecessary to say anything further on this matter. All the evidence upon the subject shows the overwhelming necessity for the erection of an armor-plate factory, and not a valid reason nor sound argument has been advanced against a Government factory. It has been demonstrated that the construction of such a factory would save the people of the United States at least $1,000,000 annually on the item of armor plate alone, to say nothing of the large sums of money that might be saved annually on other materials and other articles of arms and armament, supplies, and equipment required in our Navy.

The history of the extortionate sums of money exacted of this Government for armor plate is almost incredible. It is admitted even by the manufacturers of armor plate that there is no competition among them. Repeated investigations have fully confirmed and established the truth of the assertions that our Government is paying extortionate prices for armor plate.

I therefore indulge the hope that the Naval Affairs Committee, composed as it is of some of the ablest, most resolute, and patriotic Members of the Senate, will bring out a bill authorizing the construction of an armor-plate factory in lieu of a further investigation.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I should have done; but I felt that these things should not be left unsaid, and especially that they should not be left unsaid by me, because in April, May, June, and July I wearied the Senate, I might say, by repeated discussions of this question. How, then, could I permit the naval appropriation bill, carrying these large sums, and properly so, to pass by without a word of explanation, without a word of argument on the subject?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may include in the RECORD as a part of my remarks appendices as follows: Two editorials regarding armor plate; an article by Charles Edward Russell in Pearson's Magazine, entitled "Patriotism for Profit"; a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury showing the sums of money, aggregating in all over $6,000,000,000, that have been spent by our Government in the past 15 years for war purposes; also a letter from the honorable Secretary of the Navy showing expenditures for armor plate since 1887.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

APPENDIX A.

[From Los Angeles Tribune, May 13, 1913.]

Senator ASHURST charges that this Government has paid to the Armor Trust, which is composed of the Carnegie, Bethlehem, and Midvale companies, not less than $45,000,000 in profits for the armor plate that went into the thirty-odd armored steel vessels and the armored cruisers. The charge is probable on its face, because the makers of armor are perhaps as tight a trust as exists. There is plenty of evidence that trusts which Carnegie, Morgan, Schwab, and their kind dominate get all they can for their wares.

It has always been a mystery to the layman why a first-class battleship or cruiser should cost eight to ten millions and upward, when there are few buildings on land—largely similar in construction, only set on end—of the most magnificent size and equipment that approach such a figure. The answer is to be found in the armor graft—we call it graft because it represents unfair profits—which typifies the excessive charges on the hundred kinds of supplies that go into a warship.

One of the most disgraceful chapters in American life is that detailing the methods of the harpy hosts that preyed on the necessities of our Government in the days when civil strife combined with foreign hostility to threaten its very existence. It is no less disgraceful in our days of prosperity that the trust capitalists who owe their fortunes to the protection of the Government are bleeding it without conscience.

The Government should make its own armor plate, as it makes its rifles at arsenals. * * *

APPENDIX B.

[From Telegram, Portland, Oreg., June 3, 1913.]

WRESTLING WITH THE ARMOR PLATE TRUST.

Senator ASHURST, of Arizona, has introduced a bill in the Senate by the terms of which $1,600,000 is to be appropriated for the construction of an armor-plate plant, to be owned and operated by the National Government. The purpose of the construction of this plant is to "bust" the Armor Plate Trust, and the method is to leave the conduct of the enterprise to a board of naval officers, who shall be selected as competent to manage the plant with efficiency and economy.

Naturally, the proposition will be denounced in certain quarters as socialistic and as an interference with private enterprise. It also will be argued that the Government will not be able to manufacture armor plate so cheaply as it is done by the private manufacturer, and there will be other various and usual objections to the Government going into business for itself when private enterprise is already engaged with profit in that very business.

But the fact appears that the Government is systematically held up in the purchase of armor plate; and the present Secretary of the Navy confesses that under the present system the holdup is unavoidable. In the first place, armor-plate plants must depend on the business which the Government gives them. Unless they can get this business year by year, they can not hope to operate, so the custom has been to invite bids and apportion the business among the various manufacturers, with the understanding that they accept the lowest figures submitted. One does not have to be blessed with a lively imagination to understand the outcome of this arrangement. It is only human nature, as expressed in business terms, that the manufacturers should bid with a knowledge of what the lowest figure was going to be. Genuine competition is eliminated by the very nature of the arrangement. The Government must really pay a monopoly price or make its own armor plate. In the monopoly price there is the element of profit which the Government would forego, and in addition to that the business would be rid of all scandal and free from all extortion.

APPENDIX C.

[From Pearson's Magazine, November, 1913, by Charles Edward Russell.]

PATRIOTISM FOR PROFIT.

WAR AND RUMORS OF WAR ARE SOMETIMES INSPIRED AND ALWAYS HELPED ALONG BY HIGHLY RESPECTABLE MEN WHO THUS ARE ENABLED TO TAKE MILLIONS OF DOLLARS YEARLY OUT OF THE PUBLIC POCKET—YOUR POCKET—MEN WHO, BY AGREEMENT AMONG THEMSELVES, CHARGE YOUR GOVERNMENT FOR ARMAMENT DOUBLE WHAT IT WOULD COST YOUR GOVERNMENT TO MAKE THE ARMAMENT. JUST HOW THIS SENSELESS WASTE OF YOUR MONEY IS PROMPTED AND JUST HOW IT IS GATHERED IS TOLD IN THE FOLLOWING VERY PLAIN NARRATIVE, WHICH TELLS THE SIMPLE TRUTH BY NAMING THE MEN'S NAMES AND EXPLAINING THE MEN'S METHODS.

When we are bombarded with thundering arguments for a big and a bigger navy; when in thrilling words the need of more battleships is brought home to us; when our broad, fair land is pictured without defense and about to be invaded by the ravening foe—how much of all this is the fervent outcry of patriotism upon the watch tower and how much is sheer thrift and good heed to profits and dividends?

Here is a plain, practical question for the times, but we in this country have never thought much about it. In Europe the case is different; in Europe, where, strange to say, every nation (according to the scare mongers) is in a state as defenseless and alarming as our own, the great public is beginning to think very seriously about this and similar questions. It has mighty good reasons for such unwonted exercise, because it pays for all the battleships and big guns, and now it is obliged to wonder what for. Certain investigations have revealed the money value in francs, marks, and pounds of a good, lively war scare; also the relations between a howling Chauvinist and the dividends of the armor makers. Now, this patient, long-enduring, always-paying public is beginning to inquire whether there is anything but dividend considerations in any of these alarms and tarentelles.

One man started all this row over there. On April 18 of this year Dr. William Liebknecht blew up his bomb of ugly facts in the German Reichstag, of which he is a distinguished member, and the European armor-plate grafters have hardly known an easy hour since. Dr. Liebknecht showed to the world the close connection between war news and big business; between the circulating of war rumors and the making and selling of guns and ammunition. The initiated had long known or suspected the outlines of this sordid and disgusting story; Dr. Liebknecht, with workmanlike thoroughness, supplied the details.

An important part of the management of the great armament factories abroad is to foster international disputes, to exaggerate international ill will, and to finance and encourage navy leagues, patriotic societies, and the screaming defense societies that perennially fill the air with clamor for more battleships and more lunacy. Dr. Liebknecht showed this. The great armament houses, allied with the great financial interests, exert upon cabinets, Governments, legislators, and newspapers a covert, abnormal and apparently irresistible power to keep up the supply of friction and thereby the market for great guns. Dr. Liebknecht showed this also.

The echoes of these things are still rolling around the Continent, and in spite of the government lid they take on a more and more sinister sound.

I have read in the reactionary press of America many superior comments on these painful facts, showing conclusively that in our own happy land nothing of the kind could occur. We have no Krupp scandals here, we are assured, and could have none. Here those that cheer for the Old Flag and an appropriation, or with bulging eyes of terror describe our defenseless state, are moved by only a pure and disinterested patriotism.

It is to those that may be minded to accept this placid view of the case that the following plain narrative is especially dedicated. It ought to be instructive to all of us that pay rent or eat food or buy anything, because it tells of a bill that we annually pay, but its spiritual significance is, first of all, for those that believe the situation in America is different from the situation in other countries where high finance has gone into the armament business.

About February 1, 1913, there appeared in a back advertising page of a Philadelphia newspaper called the Daily Item an advertisement 1 inch long and 1 column wide and set in small type, inviting bids for the furnishing of 8,000 tons of armor plate for the dreadnaught battleship Pennsylvania, now being built for the United States Navy. Bids were to be opened in Washington February 18.

It was a shrinking, modest little advertisement that seemed to be trying to hide itself in the crowd of big, bawling announcements all around it, but, small as it was, it had potent effect. In a few days appeared at the same hotel in Washington the president of the Carnegie Steel Co., the vice president of the Bethlehem Steel Co., and the vice president of the Midvale Steel Co., all large and well-favored institutions and familiar in the history of armor-plate profits in America. These gentlemen conferred, and on February 16 they submitted bids, each for his own company, to furnish the 8,000 tons of armor plate required for the Pennsylvania.

This is called competitive bidding for Government contracts, according to law.

When the bids were opened they were found not to vary by so much as $1 a ton, and by another coincidence not less remarkable the prices named were about $25 a ton greater than the Government had ever before paid for armor plate of this kind.

There were no other bids. There never are any other bids.

We in this country are an easy-going people. Ordinarily details of our Government are not for us; in the sublime presence of our private balance sheets, golf clubs, and automobiles we decline to be bothered with mere affairs of state. But a conjunction of facts so remarkable as these seems to have jarred even our unapproachable complacency, or some of it, and unadmiring comment was heard, culminating in a protest on the floor of the Senate.

Nevertheless, on March 3, 1913, only a few hours before he left office, Mr. George von L. Meyer, then Secretary of the Navy, and an eminent financier of whom you may have heard, signed up the contracts for the armor plate to be furnished by these three companies, bidding in this remarkable way and at these abnormal prices.

The armor would not be needed for a year, but Mr. Meyer signed for it anyway, about the last thing before he left his job.

Senator ASHURST, of Arizona, rose in his place and offered a resolution that embodied a protest against this remarkable proceeding. May 18 Senator ASHURST, undismayed, came back with his resolution again, and was once more gagged with the good old objection, but on May 22 he managed to get the floor for a few minutes and jammed into the RECORD some vital facts that in another country would have caused a parliamentary investigation.

That was as far as he was allowed to go. Meantime the contracts stand and the companies are making the armor (and the profits) in these peculiar circumstances and at these huge profits, although the present Secretary of the Navy has not tried to conceal his belief that bidding of this kind is beyond defense.

It certainly is, for the reason that it merely represents gouge—gouge that in this case amounts to at least $1,600,000, shared among these three concerns. Respectable, legitimate, high-class, eminent, business-man gouge, I mean; not the common, low-browed variety that lands vulgar offenders in the penitentiary, but the fine old patriotic kind that can be practiced with impunity and is conveniently overlooked by the biographers when a captain of industry goes to his account.

Because the Government can very easily get this same armor plate for $254 a ton; which is $200 a ton less than these three companies are getting for it, and everybody in the Navy Department that knows a capstan from a marlin spike must know this fact perfectly well.

Eight thousand tons at $200 a ton of gouge is $1,600,000 of gouge in this one contract.

There is no particular mystery in Washington about this thing. Everybody on the inside knows about the armor-plate graft, and has known it (if he be old enough) for 25 years. In that time the United States Government has not made one reasonable contract for armor plate.

Here are the facts about this truly astonishing matter:

In 1883 we started in to build a modern Navy, having wearied of one whose chief function seemed to be to encourage superfluous humor. Having entered upon the international contest in augmenting the junk heap, we quickly showed that we could be as crazy as the best of them, bar none, and have a naval scrap pile before which no jingo American need feel the blush of shame. By 1887 we had reached a point in the race for the Bedlam stakes at which it was deemed necessary that we should send our ships on their way to the discard adorned with armor plate. Armor plate was all the rage in the world's most famous asylums, and should we confess our inferiority to the despicable foreigner?

But, alas, there wasn't a pound of armor plate in the country! Such was the lamentable fact. We had statesmen whose cheek would turn a 12-inch shell, and money-grabbers with impenetrable consciences, and national mutts and skulls that could not be pierced with diamond drills; but we didn't have enough armor plate to cover the back of your hand.

The emergency was grave. What should we do? Here were all the maniacs of the world shouting at us and inviting us to come inside with some armor plate. Of course, we just had to get some. Anybody can see that.

So Congress, that bright gathering of potent intellects, devised a way out of the perilous situation and saved the Nation. Some folks might say that if the United States needed armor plate the United States ought to make it. We were making some of the ships on which the armor plate was to be fitted, and the guns that would be poked through it, and why not also then this armor? But such persons were, of course, low demagogues and muckrakers and representatives of the riffraff, and Congress properly gave to them no heed. Instead it fixed up a deal with the Bethlehem Steel Co. by which the company put in a plant to make the armor plate, and then to repay it for the cost of installing this plant was allowed to overcharge more than 100 per cent for all the armor it made.

That is to say, the substance of this astounding deal was that the United States was to build the plant and make a present of it to the company and then the company was to charge the United States more than double price for all the armor produced by this plant.

Which is what it is doing to-day, after the United States has paid for the plant twenty-two times. You will find it difficult to beat this in the way of good, nervy grafting.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie was then actively engaged in conducting the Carnegie Steel Co., and, being then as now an eminent philanthropist, with an eye to the main chance, perceived at once that the Bethlehem people had a good thing, and rung himself in on it with a similar deal.

Whereupon contracts were let for armor plate for the monitors Amphitrite, Monadnock, Puritan, and Terror, the battleships Texas and Maine, and the coast-defense vessel Monterey at $574 and $604 a ton, the actual cost of producing this armor being about $200 a ton.

Out of these contracts alone the Bethlehem Co. received $1,554,000 in extra pay to compensate it for its plant, and the Carnegie Co. $914,252, which paid for each plant about twice.

The next time the Government wanted armor plate the price, from the plants for which it had already paid, rose to $646 a ton, and continued at or near those figures until an odd event brought it down, after we had paid for the plants nine times.

Some workingmen in the employ of the philanthropist made known the fact that the Carnegie Co. was swindling the Government it had already gouged. It was furnishing to that Government fraudulent armor—armor so badly made, so soft and spongy in spots that if a shell ever hit one of those spots it would slip through like a knife cutting cheese.

At this charge a chorus of most indignant denials filled the air. What! Would a company composed of our very best citizens and pillars of society and commerce stoop to such detestable things? No, indeed; and then, again, certainly not. But the wicked slanders persisted nevertheless, and low demagogues in Congress and elsewhere made an unseemly clamor, whereupon the Navy Department, just to show how baseless were these stories, ordered reports from the naval officers stationed as inspectors at the various armor-plate mills. These usually found the stories about defective armor to be baseless. But even this distinguished indorsement failed to silence the calumniators of true philanthropy. Therefore investigation was undertaken by a competent commission, which found that the charges were perfectly true. On 11 counts the commission found the Carnegie Co. guilty of repeatedly swindling the Government by palming off worthless armor for good.

It found, for instance, that worthless plate had been accepted, paid for, and placed on war vessels as follows:

On the Amphitrite, 4 plates.
On the Terror, 3 plates.
On the Oregon, 3 plates.
On the Monterey, 4 plates.
On the Monadnock, 6 plates.
On the New York, 8 plates.
On the Olympia, 3 plates.
On the Indiana, 6 plates.
On the Massachusetts, 4 plates.

Against the discovery and publication of these facts was exerted a great and secret influence. But for the persistence of a few newspapers, the most active of which was the New York World, the inquiry would have failed.

When the truth could be no longer concealed Mr. Carnegie's company was hauled up and fined $500,000 for frauds.

Then the same subtle and tremendous power that has so often appeared in these matters was exerted and President Cleveland, a short time before he went out of office, reduced the fine to $120 000.

Meantime the Government continued none the less to buy its armor plate of this convicted swindler, which had already made $5,000,000 of illegitimate profits on its armor-plate deals.

Quite a number of libraries would be required to balance this account.

To the investigation of these gigantic frauds the New York World had assigned a wise, skillful reporter named Montgomery Cutler. He secured the assistance of workingmen in the factory and gathered unassailable evidence that worthless armor was being palmed off upon the Government, notwithstanding that a high naval officer was stationed at the works and supposed to inspect rigidly every piece of armor sent out. This officer gave to the armor-plate company a clean acquittal. Nothing, according to his report, was wrong with that factory. Mr. Cutler found that this officer was a great social favorite in the city and particularly popular in the leading club, which was chiefly maintained by eminent gentlemen in the iron and steel way. If you are interested in the matter of power, you may care to note that when the Spanish War came on this officer, never much distinguished in the service, was, to the amazement of most observers, suddenly jumped to high command over the heads of many older men of greater experience, and throughout the war and afterwards an extraordinary influence seemed to support and sustain him.

But when the facts about the perilous armor frauds were proved and made public an unwonted clamor arose in the country. In those days we were even more indifferent than we are now to our national affairs. Nevertheless, even in those days the idea that we were paying an eminent philanthropist huge sums for armor plate that might ruin our costly new Navy finally did work itself into our minds and produced rather remarkable results there and elsewhere. The representatives of our best citizenship that were in charge of these looting armor-plate factories seemed for a long time to sing very small and in the fear of God, and the price of armor plate dropped overnight from $646 to $411 a ton, and at that figure for many months it remained.

But even at that figure it was a swindle and a fraud, and from time to time mutterings of discontent were heard in Congress—which is surprising, for in those days Congress was so well trained that ordinarily it would come right up and eat out of Mr. Carnegie's hand. Finally the Secretary of the Navy was requested in a gentlemanly way to look about him and see if he could devise any good reason why armor plate should cost $411 a ton. The job seems to have strained his intellect, but he finally turned in the following showing, which may be deemed one of the most amazing documents in the American collection:

TO MAKE 1 TON OF ARMOR PLATE.

Cost of labor and material	$196
Maintenance of plant (unexplained)	50
To bring this to a round number	4
Fifty per cent profit on this	125
Nickel	20
To bring this to a round number	5
Total	400
Swindle, therefore, only	11

Nickel is an indispensable factor in making armor plate.

The Naval Committee of the Senate does not seem to have been much impressed with this startling calculation, for it began an inquiry and made some figures of its own, thus:

Cost of labor and material	$168
Add for reforging	12
Maintenance of plant	30
Thirty-three and one-third per cent profit on this	70
Nickel	20
Total	300
Swindle	111
Price to the Government	411

Just why an armor-plate factory must make even 33⅓ per cent profit when the average man in business is glad to make 8 was a mystery that caused some inquiry in the Senate, probably among those that did not foresee the necessities of the philanthropic library. And then in the debate Mr. Carnegie's company had been called "robber rascals," "monopolists," "thieves," "pets of the Senate," and other terms that must have caused much pain to leading citizens and admired captains of industry, and the huge profit may have been regarded in the light of a necessary balm to hurt minds. Anyway, it stayed in the report.

The Naval Committee now proposed to fix the price of armor plate at $300 a ton, on the basis of this liberal estimate and allowing the manufacturers 33⅓ per cent profit. Did it succeed? Indeed it did not. The subtle influence was there again, and so were Matt Quay and a few other patriots of that kind, and the proposal was dropped.

So the price remained at $411 until the scare began to wear away. Then it was pushed up to $453 for some kinds of armor; then to $480; then to $508; and now for turret armor it is in the neighborhood of $700.

We are still paying every year for that old plant.

Since 1887, under conditions like these, the United States Government has purchased $83,000,000 worth of armor plate, about one-half representing pure graft.

I have been at pains to figure the lowest possible amount of gouge in each contract made since the Naval Committee's investigation, taking as a basis the committee's extravagant price of $300 a ton, and the table on the next page is the result for the three companies that get all this work. I have taken in each case the lowest figure paid for any armor on any vessel and calculated all the armor at that price, so that my totals, although they will seem astounding, are far under the truth.

The Carnegie Co. is openly a part of the United States Steel Corporation, the greatest possession of the great Morgan group, the center around which revolves the most powerful and indomitable influence in our affairs. The Bethlehem Co., it is well understood, is financed by Mr. Carnegie, the chief holder of the bonds of the United States Steel Corporation. The Midvale Co. came into the merry game in 1903, under the guise of competition at lower prices, until it was well under way, when it joined the combination and got its share of the gouge, as will be seen from the table in the next column.

The Bethlehem and Midvale companies maintained more or less the convenient supposition of an existence independent of the United States Steel, an arrangement of great practical use, particularly before congressional investigations. As a matter of fact, all of these companies are parts of the great steel interests that work together harmoniously to control the entire iron and steel industry of the country. On trials and at public hearings much is made of the fact that they have different organizations, and, strange as it may seem, men are still to be found that are dull enough to be imposed upon by this device. However these organizations may be juggled and manipulated, every well-informed observer knows that the final control of all comes home and must come home to the same center where gather the reins of so many industries and the streams of so much capital, where already is owned or controlled more than one-fourth of all the wealth in the United States.

That is to say, to the Morgan group.

In 1897 the Senate found that the real ownership of the Bethlehem-Carnegie companies was practically the same although they made a feeble pretense of competing. So they do now. The Senate also found that these companies worked in collusion and divided the gouge. So they do now.

The amount of gouge or excessive profit secured by the three companies on each contract since 1897, when the Senate first investigated this subject.

In 1897 the Senate found that all over the world the makers of armor plate were in one combination and charged all Governments the like extortionate prices. So they do now. "We found," says the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 1, 1897, "that all the armor manufacturers in the world are in the same combination that these two American concerns are in—the Creusot people in France, the German manufacturers, and the English are all together, each robbing their own Government." So little does all this seem to have changed that the Navy Department prints in defense of our extravagant payments the fact that the European end of the combination is as rapacious as the American, and on August 8, 1913, before a committee of the English House of Commons, testimony was given about the English armor-plate combination that seemed a replica of our own bitter experience.

In England, as in Germany, it appeared that back of the armament combination was a financial combination, huge, international, and unassailable.

As it is with the making of our armor, so it is with the building of our ships. We have Government navy yards, maintained at great expense, to build and repair the Nation's vessels, and but for the periodical clamor of Congressmen whose districts include these yards we should never build anything in any of them. Because of the clamor a battleship or cruiser sometimes occupies the stocks in one of these yards. All the rest, by the overt connivance of the Navy Department, are built by private companies.

On the Atlantic the great contracts go to the Fore River Shipbuilding Co., at Quincy, Mass.; to William Cramp & Sons, Philadelphia; to the New York Shipbuilding Co., at Camden, N. J.; or to the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., at Newport News. Small vessels may be built by several minor concerns, including the Harlan & Hollingsworth Co., at Wilmington, Del., and Samuel L. Moore & Sons, Elizabethport, N. J.

On the Pacific the great contracts have gone chiefly to the Union Iron Works, San Francisco.

To show how true this is, I have here a list of battleships and armored cruisers built in recent years by these firms and the prices they received for the work. It is printed to show merely the division of contracts for the most important and profitable vessels of the Navy. Room is lacking for similar details about the smaller vessels:

William Cramp & Sons.

Ships.	Year authorized.	Contract price for hull, machinery, and armor.
BATTLESHIPS.
Indiana	1890	$5,533,708
Massachusetts	1890	5,401,844
Iowa	1892	5,162,587
Alabama	1896	4,077,010
Maine	1898	4,567,464
Idaho	1903	4,797,675
Mississippi	1903	4,740,800
South Carolina	1905	5,669,186
Wyoming	1909	7,647,902

Brooklyn	1892	3,944,820
Saratoga	1888	3,897,840
Colorado	1900	4,831,941
Pittsburgh	1899	4,857,086
Tennessee	1902	5,203,701

This company is now building one gunboat, one submarine, and four torpedo boat destroyers.

New York Shipbuilding Co.

Ships.	Year authorized.	Contract price for hull, machinery, and armor.
BATTLESHIPS.
Kansas	1903	$6,200,929
New Hampshire	1904	5,976,236
Michigan	1905	5,693,609
Utah	1908	6,832,392
Arkansas	1911	7,785,602
ARMORED CRUISER.
Washington	1902	5,190,782

This company is now building two torpedo-boat destroyers and a first-class battleship.

Newport News Shipbuilding Co.

Ships.	Year authorized.	Contract price for hull, machinery, and armor.
BATTLESHIPS.
Kearsarge	1895	$4,429,890
Kentucky	1895	4,418,094
Illinois	1896	4,073,429
Missouri	1898	4,438,925
Louisiana	1902	6,065,531
Minnesota	1903	6,149,874

Maryland	1900	4,874,874
West Virginia	1899	4,885,216
North Carolina	1904	4,779,380
Montana	1904	4,781,089

This company is now building, with other ships, one first-class battleship, two colliers, and one submarine.

The Fore River Shipbuilding Co.

Ships.	Year authorized.	Contract price for hull, machinery, and armor.
BATTLESHIPS.
Vermont	1903	$6,166,267
New Jersey	1900	5,385,805
Rhode Island	1900	5,360,125
North Dakota	1907	7,244,549
Nevada	1911	.....

This company is now building, with other ships, two torpedo-boat destroyers and four submarines. It has built 15 of the submarines.

Union Iron Works.

Ships.	Year authorized.	Contract price for hull, machinery, and armor.
BATTLESHIPS.
Oregon	1890	$5,914,021
Wisconsin	1896	4,162,617
Ohio	1898	4,475,375
ARMORED CRUISERS.
California	1899	4,713,274
South Dakota	1908	4,735,160

This company is building or has lately completed five more submarines.

As before, who owns these companies that rake off all these good things?

Well, the Bethlehem Steel Co. owns the Union Iron Works outright, also the Harlan & Hollingsworth Co. and Samuel L. Moore & Sons.

William Cramp & Sons is a Morgan concern, pure and simple. It is controlled by a Morgan voting trust composed of E. T. Stotesbury, who is the leading member of the Morgan firm in Philadelphia, and George F. Baer, who is the Morgan factotum in the peculiar operation of the Philadelphia & Reading.

The Fore River Co. is classed as a United States Steel concern, the two companies having an interlocking directorate through Mr. Robert Winsor, who is a director in both. The most influential owners of Fore River are also active in financial and other enterprises that represent the New England interests of the Morgan group. But, obviously, all these companies must in practice be allied, if not actually and frankly affiliated. To conduct a great shipbuilding plant requires a great capital, and great capital for an enterprise unfriendly to the central controlling groups could not be obtained in these days. This fits again with the fact that the whole iron and steel business of the country is a Morgan gronp enterprise. Shipbuilding is a branch of the steel business; and a company independent of the dominant forces could not possibly operate in iron and steel. Hence the beautiful harmony. As for instance:

When a battleship contract is to be let on the Atlantic coast, the shipbuilding companies seem to be endowed with such clairvoyant powers as we have remarked in the cases of the armor-plate concerns that are also members of the same agreeable family. The bids always manage to fall out that the good things are apportioned neatly among the companies, and all are kept in the goodly way of profits. In the interest of steady dividends, it is desirable that the United States shall authorize two battleships and two armored cruisers (or the equivalent thereof) each year. A simple device in adjusting the bids keeps these distributed and all the yards busy. If one yard bids $5,830,082 for the first battleship and $5,930,082 for the second, while the next yard bids $5,930,082 for the first battleship and $5,830,082 for the second, it is apparent that each will get a contract and be happy. Keep the contracts in the family and save money is the motto of the group; and by some amusing trick of speech the legerdemain that is performed on these contracts is called competitive bidding.

The worst troubles that befall this happy family come when some one arises in Congress and points out that all the battleships are unnecessary and foolish, being doomed in 10 years to the junk heap. Then Congress tries to authorize but one of these colossal toys instead of two. Upon the head of such a rude disturber of the family peace all the Morganized press and the newspapers friendly to our best citizenship pour endless ridicule and abuse, the Navy League volleys and thunders, and a large, efficient, and discreet lobby works industriously at the back door.

Generally these powerful and patriotic influences succeed in saving the Nation by restoring that other battleship—for the glory of the flag and the profits of the poor but undeserving financiers.

The country's defenseless condition is at all times the favorite theme of many of these newspaper guardians of the commonweal. Even when the extra battleship has been secured and you might think that all was well with us these sentinels upon the watchtower refuse to take a cheerful view of life. True, we are to have another battleship or two; but what if we are? Just look at our coast defenses. Not a big gun there worth talking about, not a fortification worthy of the name; Absequam unprotected and Egg Harbor without a gun. At any moment the Japanese are likely to descend upon Lumtiloo Creek, and then where shall we be? Scanning the horizon, the editors see daily fresh fleets of hostile nations in the offing, and the whole country at their mercy—an imminent peril from which we have no chance of rescue unless Congress will make haste to pass some more appropriations and order yet more vessels, to be built as above indicated.

Current events, or what purport so to be, lend to these journals the ready instances wherewith to point the moral of their appeals. Every week with them produces its fresh scare. Now it is Magdalena Bay, upon which the devilish Japanese are declared to have some depraved designs that will bring ruin upon us all. Nobody knows where or what is Magdalena Bay, but with the assistance of an inquiry in Congress and some ardent editorials the thing can be made to look of overwhelming importance, and the machinations of the devilish Japanese to be of the deadliest. Therefore we must have more battleships. When this bugaboo has been worked to the limit, the designs of Germany on South America are disclosed as the intolerable menace to our peace and prosperity. Remedy—more battleships. After this the European Governments are found to be meditating the mischief and all in Mexico. Ergo, more battleships. At the subsidence of this nightmare Great Britain mounts a new gun at Bermuda and the whole blessed Monroe doctrine is in peril. Nothing can save us but more battlesnips.

The inspiration for many of these utterances about the battleship and armament situation is a curious and active institution in Washington called the Navy League. I have once before referred to it in these annals, and with good reason, for its functions seem to be persistent and important. It occupies a corner suite in the handsome Southern Building, whence it pours forth a stream of literature and appeals calling upon the Nation to rise and arm itself with a great big Navy ere it shall be too late and the heel of the hated foe shall be upon our prostrate necks, or thereabouts. The avowed purposes of this organization are of the purest patriotism, but it seems to have more money and less difficulty in financing itself than any other patriotic society of which we have record. The annual dues are $2, which, according to human experience, will not go very far in hiring expensive rooms, employing staffs of clerks, and publishing beautiful pamphlets, unless the membership happens to be very large, which certainly is not the case here. But a difficulty that has swamped many another organization has no apparent terrors for the prosperous Navy League.

Occasionally this concern gives elaborate banquets and invites thereto the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, Senators, Representatives, and many other eminent and influential persons, to whom skilled orators picture our defenseless condition in a way that would strike terror to the hearts of the bravest. At these feasts the fact is always made perfectly clear that nothing can save us but battleships and a big appropriation. Since with dues of $2 a year the ordinary society can not give much of a banquet to speak of, the origin of the funds to provide these chaste affairs has long been a subject of speculation in Washington, but not, I may say, among those that have studied the list of the league's officers.

Among the literature distributed freely by this organization is a reprint of a magazine article written by an English cave man named Harold F. Wyatt and bearing the pleasant title "God's Test War." The theme of this surviving savage is that war is divinely ordained, and therefore a pious undertaking, not to be opposed or questioned except by atheists and the totally depraved. It is, in fact, the means by which God corrects His own mistakes, sifting out the efficient from the inefficient among the human beings He has created, and putting the inefficient out of the way; wherefore the true business of His children, as you can readily see, is to kill one another. This line of argument seems to be held very convincing for more battleships and a big appropriation—to be distributed, of course, according to the table to be found on a foregoing page

The mission of the league, according to its own announcement, is to further the ends of patriotism. Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan was, until his death, one of the directors and intensely interested in the league's work, to which he was a liberal contributor. This is all the more interesting, because in the course of a long career it happens to be the only manifestation of patriotism Mr. Morgan ever made, and suggests that the appeal of the league must be indeed of a very moving kind.

Mr. Morgan was not only intensely interested in the league himself, but he seems to have been able to arouse a similarly keen and vivid interest in gentlemen associated with him.

Mr. Herbert L. Satterlee, for instance, is general counsel for the league. Mr. Satterlee is a son-in-law and an heir of Mr. Morgan.

Gen. Horace Porter is the president of the league. He was for many years an officer of the Pullman Co., which is a Morgan corporation.

Mr. Charles C. Glover is treasurer of the league. He is president of the Riggs National Bank, which is closer to Wall Street than any other bank in Washington.

Col. Robert M. Thompson is chairman of the executive committee of the league. He is an eminent financier of New York, whose great interests generally coincide with the colossal undertakings of the Morgan group. He is also the head (being chairman of the board) of the International Nickel Co., and holds the honorable post of president of the New York Metal Exchange.

Mr. J. Frederick Tams is a director of the league. He is a New York society and yachting man, a friend of Mr. Morgan and a member of Mr. Morgan's yacht club.

Mr. George von L. Meyer is a director of the league. Mr. Meyer, as already noted, was Secretary of the Navy in the Taft administration, and on March 3 signed the remarkable contract for the Pennsylvania's armor that has been the subject of unpleasant comment in Congress and elsewhere. About these Mr. Meyer has seemed not to be disturbed—possibly because he has so many other things on his mind. Mr. Meyer is a gentleman of large and varied interests, most of them financial, and well known in our highest business circles. He is a considerable stockholder in the New Haven Railroad, which is a Morgan concern, and he is interested in financial institutions in Boston and elsewhere that were understood to be sympathetic with Mr. Morgan's aims when he was alive. Mr. Meyer is also a director in the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co. at Manchester, N. H. Another associate of his on the board of the Amoskeag is Mr. F. C. Dumaine, who helped Mr. Morgan to incorporate the Boston Railroad Holding Co. by which the New Haven was enabled to hold the Boston & Maine in spite of certain provisions of the Massachusetts law. Mr. Dumaine is also a director of the Fore River Shipbuilding Co., which is on friendly terms with the Morgan group and affiliated with the United States Steel.

With a board of directors containing all these wise and experienced men that are on terms of friendship with our greatest captains of industry, our defenseless condition may be believed to be in safe hands and the activities of the Navy League to be unremitting.

Senator ASHURST is now trying to get a Government armor-plate factory established so that the Treasury may be spared further payment of such toll to the three armor-plate companies as appears in the startling table printed on a foregoing page. Speaking of patriotism, this would seem to be about as patriotic as anything going. Also, speaking of battleships, it would seem to be exceedingly pertinent since for the amounts gouged by the three companies the United States could build eight first-class vessels of this kind But, strange to say, Senator ASHURST'S project has received not one word of encouragement from that eminent champion of patriotism and battleships, the Navy League.

The patriotic Morgan group has been silent, the eagle eyes that perceive our defenseless condition have turned upon the Senator's project only the frigid stare of disapproval. Not a word of help comes from the watchtower, not an approving editorial from the fervent press.

For this amazing silence there may be reasons the world knows not of. Meantime we may at least fix our gaze upon the undeniable fact that since 1887 the United States Government has expended $83,000,000 for armor plate, of which at least one-half has been pure gouge. Which, to some minds, will be reason enough.

No; we have no Krupps in this country. That is perfectly true. And one may say that so long as our blessed groups retain their health and vigor we shall need none. Also we have no Liebknechts in Congress; but that we need none will probably appear far from certain to anyone that will read this plain story.

APPENDIX D.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 19, 1914.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your communication of the 13th instant, requesting information as to the appropriations made for Army and Navy purposes, fortifications, pensions, etc., during the fiscal years 1899 to 1914, inclusive.

In reply thereto I inclose a statement covering your inquiries compiled from the records of the Treasury Department.

Very truly, yours,

C. S. HAMLIN, Assistant Secretary.

APPENDIX F.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
Washington, June 13, 1913.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your telephone inquiry of yesterday morning as to the amount of money expended by the Navy Department for armor plate, the following is a statement showing the amounts expended to date:

Since 1887, to Carnegie Steel Co., Pittsburgh, Pa	$30,844,153.56
Since 1887, to Bethlehem Steel Co., South Bethlehem, Pa	34,215,112.58
Since 1903, to Midvale Steel Co., Philadelphia, Pa	12,044,217.41
Total	77,103,483.55

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 60, line 7, after the word "authorized," to insert "to be available until expended," and in line 8, after the word "expended," to strike out "$36,656,734" and insert "$36,456,734," so as to make the clause read:

Total increase of the Navy heretofore and herein authorized, to be available until expended, $36,456,734.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. THORNTON. I now ask that the naval appropriation bill may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 264) authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the Sixth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations, and it was thereupon signed by the Presiding Officer as Acting President pro tempore of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 28, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 27, 1914.

POSTMASTERS.

Ector P. Gobie, Woodstock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 27, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God and Father of us all, whose boundless love searcheth the hearts of Thy children and purgeth them from sin and iniquity, fill our hearts completely, that we may be free from guile, from self-seeking; that we may rise to the dignity Thou hast bestowed upon us, and work the works of righteousness; growing wise and strong and pure, that the peace that passeth understanding may be ours; in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, OMAHA—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. FITZGERALD, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6867) to increase and fix the compensation of the collector of customs for the customs collection district of Omaha, and the same was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with the proceedings under Calendar Wednesday for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas moves that the House dispense with the proceedings under Calendar Wednesday for this day.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 7, noes 45.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum voting or present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that no quorum is present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GARDNER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER. If the motion of the gentleman prevails, what is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The call of committees.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. If we dispense with Calendar Wednesday for the day, then the special rule under which the House is operating, which excludes everything except Calendar Wednesday, will be in force, will it not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. It is some time since the Chair read that rule, but the Chair thinks it excepts Calendar Wednesday and everything connected with it. The Chair ruled that way last night as to adjournment. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. I understand that the carrying of the gentleman's motion would really give us the call of committees, which is the thing we have Calendar Wednesday for.

The SPEAKER. No; it would not give the Calendar Wednesday call, but the ordinary House call.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. WINGO. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MANN. It is too late to withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will look at the special order to see exactly what it provides——

Mr. MANN. That is a matter that will come up afterwards. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of dispensing with Calendar Wednesday for to-day will answer "aye," those opposed "no."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 13, nays 257, answered "present" 6, not voting 157, as follows:

For 10 days:
Mr. HILL with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no," but I have a pair with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and I desire to withdraw that vote and to answer "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The Doorkeeper was directed to open the doors.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to state that in answer to the parliamentary inquiry by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], and also the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], not having read the rule for some time, the Chair made an incorrect ruling as to what would happen if the affirmative of this vote had prevailed. Here is the language of the rule:

> The order of business provided by this resolution shall be the continuing order of business of the House until concluded, except that it shall not interfere with Calendar Wednesday—

And so forth.

Of course, that question will not arise very often under that rule, although it may arise next Wednesday.

REVISION OF THE LAWS—JUDICIARY TITLE.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The unfinished business is H. R. 15578, and the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, on last Wednesday unanimous consent was given to return to sections 67, 68, and 69, for the purpose of making a motion to strike out the three sections and substitute three sections in lieu thereof. In making the entry the clerk inadvertently, on page 8905 of the RECORD, states that the amendment is offered to page 35, line 8, when it should be page 36, line 8. For the purpose of getting the RECORD straight and letting the membership of the House understand the situation I will move now, after having returned to these sections, to strike out those sections and substitute therefor the new sections. Section 67 will be found on page 8903 of the RECORD. Section 68 on page 8905 of the RECORD and section 69 on page 8906 of the RECORD. I ask that those three sections which are to be offered for the original sections be now read.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Are these amendments offered and to be considered separately, or all together?

Mr. WATKINS. Upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois I have offered them all together, because they are all on the same subject matter.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection, but the gentleman must have unanimous consent to have them considered together.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not think that is necessary, because I asked unanimous consent last Wednesday, and it was granted.

Mr. MANN. The request of last Wednesday was that the gentleman might offer the amendments and have them pending.

Mr. WATKINS. There was no objection last Wednesday, although there may be to-day.

Mr. MANN. I do not care how they are considered, but I make this parliamentary inquiry of the Chair: Are these offered as one amendment or three separate and distinct amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that they are offered by unanimous consent as one amendment.

Mr. MANN. The Chair considers it as one amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; by unanimous consent. The Clerk will read the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 23, strike out the section and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 67. That all fees and emoluments authorized by law to be paid to clerks of United States district courts shall be charged as heretofore, and shall be collected by said clerks and covered into the Treasury of the United States; that it shall be the duty of all clerks of United States district courts to require payment in advance for services to be rendered by them otherwise than for the United States, except where the person requiring the services is relieved by law from prepayment of fees and costs; and that, subject to this limitation, the clerk shall account quarterly for all fees and emoluments earned within the quarter last preceding such accounting, and for all fees and emoluments received within the quarter which had been earned prior thereto: Provided, That the portion of the fees which the naturalization law allows clerks of the United States district courts to retain shall be accounted for to the United States, and be included in the quarterly accounting for naturalization fees required by law to be made, except that upon the approval of the Secretary of Labor a clerk of any United States court collecting naturalization fees in excess of $6,000 in the fiscal year 1914, or in any fiscal year thereafter, may retain so much of $3,000 of naturalization fees in the following fiscal year as may be necessary to pay for the clerical assistants, for naturalization purposes only, which clerks of courts are required to employ by section 13 of the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. L., pt. 1, p. 596); and said clerks shall be paid for their official services salaries and compensation hereinafter provided, and not otherwise: Provided further, That this section shall not be construed to require or authorize fees to be charged against or collected from the United States, except in case of mileage allowance and per diem compensation when clerks are attending court at places other than their official residence, as provided in section 66 of this act."

"SEC. 69. That the necessary office expenses of the clerks of the United States district courts shall be allowed when authorized by the Attorney General. And when in the opinion of the Attorney General the public interest requires it, he may, on the recommendation of the clerk, which recommendation shall state the facts as distinguished from conclusions showing necessity for the same, allow the clerk to employ necessary deputies and clerical assistants, upon salaries to be fixed by the Attorney General from time to time and paid as hereinafter provided. When any such deputy or clerical assistant is necessarily absent from the place of his regular employment on official business, he shall be allowed his actual traveling expenses only, and his necessary and actual expenses for lodging and subsistence, not to exceed $3 per day. And he shall make and render accounts thereof quarterly, in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Attorney General, and shall be verified on oath before any officer authorized to administer oaths: Provided, That said accounts for expenses shall have attached thereto the certificate of the clerk that the expenses charged were incurred by the deputy or clerical assistant when necessarily absent from the place of his regular employment on official business. The expense accounts of the deputies or clerical assistants, when made out and certified in accordance with this act, shall be paid by the marshal, who shall make such return thereof as may be prescribed by the Attorney General."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this bill as originally presented provided for a uniform salary of $5,000 for all clerks, but there was an amendment offered to the first of these sections by the gentleman from Iowa, which amendment incorporated the facts expressed in the bill which had been reported favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary. As the Judiciary Committee had had lengthy hearings and was supposed to have carefully investigated the question, and as reports had been received from the Department of Justice as well as from the Department of Commerce and Labor and also from the Department of Labor in reference to the matter, I was persuaded, after a thorough investigation of the question myself, to offer these three several amendments. This proposition as to clerks' salary is in lieu of the former law which fixed the salary at $3,500. After the abolition of the circuit courts the fees of the clerks of the district courts ought to be more than they were prior to that, and these provisions are for the purpose of, as far as possible, putting the salary on an equitable basis. The fees enumerated in the various sections of this statute go into the United States Treasury, and the salaries fixed for the various clerks of the United States seem to be in conformity with the facts as detailed in the hearings before the Judiciary Committee. That is the explanation I have to make with reference to these salaries which are stated here in the various districts.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to state that the proposed salary in the western district of Texas is $3,500, while in the northern district of Texas it is $4,000. I would like to know why there is this difference. I believe the salaries throughout the bill run from $3,500 up.

Mr. WATKINS. Two thousand five hundred dollars to four thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What was the method by which the committee arrived at the amount that the clerks should receive in the different districts of the United States?

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman will examine the report of the Judiciary Committee on the bill which formed the basis of the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Iowa, he will see that under the hearings on that bill was shown the difference between the fees which were received in the northern districts and the southern districts or in the eastern and western districts of the various States.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that I formerly represented El Paso, and that there is a great deal of work there on Chinese, Japanese, and Mexican immigrants coming into this country.

Mr. WATKINS. They are allowed for that work extra compensation of $3,000, if they earn that much to pay for the clerical work of that character.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That was the reason I asked that question. I know that these clerks were very insistent on having some additional pay for this additional work that was forced upon them. The northern district of Texas has none of that work.

Mr. WATKINS. If he takes in $6,000 in work of that kind, he gets $3,000 extra. Understand, that does not go directly to the clerk, but it goes to pay his clerical help.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Louisiana whether these amendments will have the effect of abolishing the fee system, so far as personal compensation to the clerks is concerned?

Mr. WATKINS. It does not abolish the fee system at all.

Mr. MOORE. I mean the clerk's compensation.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; the clerk himself does not receive the fees of the office. He charges them up, and they are paid into the Treasury, and he receives his salary in lieu of the fees.

Mr. MOORE. Then, there are to be no fees hereafter for the personal use of the clerk?

Mr. WATKINS. No; except in naturalization cases; and then if he takes in $6,000 in naturalization fees he gets $3,000 for clerical help in connection with that work.

Mr. MOORE. That simply means that he would be paid out of the naturalization fees to the extent of $3,000 a year if the fees amount to $6,000 a year?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania while on his feet a question. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania please inform the House why the common pleas courts in his own city and in the city of Pittsburgh absolutely refuse to perform naturalization service in qualifying aliens for citizenship?

Mr. MOORE. I know that to a certain extent they do refuse to do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am informed authoritatively that they absolutely refuse to take jurisdiction in any case and throw the entire work on the Federal courts.

Mr. MOORE. The common pleas courts do because they do not consider it their business; they have plenty to do and regard naturalization as the business of the Federal courts.

Mr. STAFFORD. They have concurrent jurisdiction under the naturalization act to naturalize citizens.

Mr. MOORE. I can only say that they regard it as business of which they should not take cognizance and that to a certain extent it has resulted in clogging the business in the Federal courts.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit, I think I can offer an explanation. I had a good deal of experience in regard to the superior courts of my State. The department here refuses to send out the necessary books to the courts, and there is a provision in the law that they must have——

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I know that so far as my State is concerned the department does not refuse to send them out. They are as considerate of the State courts as they are of the Federal courts.

Mr. TRIBBLE. It is a great convenience to allow the State courts to do it, but they now require the district courts to perform that service.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I will say for the courts of Philadelphia—and I am not a lawyer and constantly in the courts as is the gentleman from Wisconsin when he is at home—they have an abundance of work that arises in the usual way, legal work which must be attended to, and they are far behind on that. There is a constant demand on the part of litigants for early determination of cases, and the naturalization business is very large. They simply feel that it is not their province and they do not worry themselves with it.

I wanted to ask the gentleman from Louisiana another question. The clerks are still bonded, of course?

Mr. WATKINS. Oh, yes.

Mr. MOORE. What money actually passes through their hands?

Mr. WATKINS. They are expected to collect these fees and to turn them over into the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE. Until these amendments were presented, there were some perquisites, were there not, that the clerks were entitled to?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; in certain cases they received one-half of the amount of the fees. There was a maximum fixed.

Mr. MOORE. I have knowledge of one suit which involved the right of the clerk to retain certain fees, and that suit went through the Court of Claims. It arose in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. WATKINS. I suppose that perhaps the gentleman is referring to the special law which was enacted giving them a part of the naturalization fees also, and now they are being placed on a salary basis, and they are allowed that up to the extent of $3,000 for clerical help.

Mr. MOORE. This Massachusetts case involved the enforcement by the Government of a bond given by the clerk, and I believe that case has not yet been determined. I would like to know just how these amendments will relieve the clerk of a court from keeping in his own possession or being personally responsible for fees that may or may not have been earned.

Suppose a lawyer in Pittsburgh asks for a transcript of a decision rendered by the court in the eastern district of Pennsylvania. Do I understand this amendment now provides that the lawyer in Pittsburgh must advance the money to the clerk in Philadelphia?

Mr. WATKINS. Unless the clerk is willing to take the responsibility of trusting him; and if he does, he will have to account for the amount.

Mr. MOORE. Well, I have in mind a case where the clerk involved himself by being accommodating; he is not now the clerk——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more to pursue this inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE. Is there any way by which the clerk could be relieved of giving credit to some one he knew and respected, but who might not finally make good?

Mr. WATKINS. I think the very fact that he has respected him would cause him to trust him, and in that way he would become involved, if the man whom he trusted proved unworthy of his trust, and there is no way to relieve the responsibility of his failing to make collections.

Mr. MOORE. The Solicitor of the Treasury Department has recently settled a case in which he held the bondsmen for a clerk who trusted certain people for transcripts, and so forth, involving the payment of fees.

Mr. WATKINS. That would be entirely too uncertain a way of doing business. The law requires him to make the collection in advance.

Mr. MOORE. I grant it is an uncertain way of doing business and reprehensible; but the point I desire to know is whether the amendment, which was rather long, corrects that abuse?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; it corrects it in this way, that it requires him to make collection in advance and requires an accounting for the fees earned.

Mr. MOORE. We are to have the payment in advance.

Mr. WATKINS. The principle is not new, but the language is a little different. The principle has been the same all the time.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman think the amendment will reach and improve that condition?

Mr. WATKINS. Not in that particular respect—I do not think it would.

Mr. MOORE. Then the practice will be left very largely to the judgment and integrity of the clerk.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not think so at all; I think it absolutely requires him to make collections and account for them.

Mr. MOORE. I would think it better if he had no discretion in the matter at all——

Mr. WATKINS. He has none at all.

Mr. MOORE. I am satisfied to call the attention of the gentleman to at least two cases of which I have knowledge where the question arose, in one of which the good nature of the clerk in trusting those who ordered documents from him subsequently involved him.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BARTLETT. Upon this amendment, upon this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia inquires upon what subject.

Mr. BARTLETT. Upon this bill?

Mr. POWERS. I want to say something about this bill and something about other matters.

Mr. BARTLETT. Generally, I have no objection to such requests, but it seems to me that the ordinary procedure is for gentlemen to state upon what subject they desire to extend their remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia object?

Mr. MOORE. I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia if the gentleman from Kentucky states that he will put what he desires to extend in the back of the RECORD, would the gentleman object?

Mr. BARTLETT. It is very rare I make any suggestion at all about extension of remarks, but I think the request is somewhat irregular, and the House ought to be informed upon what subject the gentleman desires to extend his remarks.

Mr. MOORE. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky desires to put in the back of the RECORD what he desires to insert, so as not to burden this proceeding at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this bill were to fix and limit the clerk's salary at $5,000 and allow the fee system to be continued. On the calendar of the House, however, there was a bill reported from the Judiciary Committee, unanimously reported favorably, to take the clerks of the United States courts out from the fee system entirely, as had already been taken the United States marshals and United States district attorneys, and put them upon a graduated salary. I think that meets with practically the unanimous approval of the bar. It has been several times approved by the American Bar Association. It meets with the approval of all jurists, because the fee system as an adjunct or part of the judiciary system is universally considered to be wrong. Now, for that purpose I introduced an amendment to this bill, which is in substance that Clayton bill, and which is now pending.

This amendment has the approval of the chairman of the committee, who now makes it in effect a committee amendment. There is no question, I think, but what this system will approve itself to the people if adopted, as I hope it will be. The showing made in the testimony before the committee is that the amount of fees now received in United States courts amounted in the year 1911 to $1,123,790. The total amount of clerks' salaries, as fixed in this amendment, will be $337,000. The total amount paid the deputies and other assistants in the clerks' offices will amount to $447,000, a total of cost in the clerks' offices of $784,000.

This will leave a surplus, Mr. Chairman, of fees received in the clerks' offices every year of $339,790 that will be conveyed into the Treasury of the United States under the system which we are now asked to adopt by this amendment. It is stated in the testimony by those experts of the Attorney General's office who made the examination that the amount received from fees under the fee system as we now have it will very soon pay all the costs of the United States court, even including the salaries of the United States district judges.

The salaries as fixed in this schedule extend from $2,500 to $4,500. The basis on which these salaries have been so fixed was given by the committee as follows. They took into consideration:

1. The number of places of holding court and the number of offices maintained by each clerk. There are 391 separate offices in the several districts in charge of clerks. The marshals and district attorneys maintain one office in each district of the United States, or 79 in all.
2. The volume of business in each district, both civil and criminal, as shown by the official reports of the Attorney General.
3. The salaries now paid to United States attorneys and marshals in the several districts.
4. The net amount each clerk has been paid for his services annually under the fee system.
5. The population, progress, and development of the several districts and their future possibilities.
6. The fact that many clerks are lawyers and under section 273 of the judicial code are prohibited from practicing in the courts.
7. The revenue-producing qualities of the several districts. The reports of the Attorney General show that the clerks will collect and pay into the Treasury of the United States annually, after deducting the total amount to be paid in salaries under this bill, the sum of $415,346.16, which is an average based upon the receipts for the past three years and increasing steadily. This amount represents the collections exclusively from individuals and corporations and the United States will receive the services of the clerks gratis.
8. The various duties of the clerks and the economy incident to capable executive ability in the clerk's office.

Under this basis the salaries of the clerks have been fixed. Of course, I recognize the fact that there will be objections made in individual cases, and these may be taken care of by amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNER. And these changes may be made either here by amendment or in the Senate when the bill shall be considered there. The great advantage of this bill is that it does away with the fee system. I need not say to Members of the House that that is a great advantage from every possible standpoint. The clerks themselves will certainly approve of the salary system, because the former system has involved them in very many embarrassments. There have been pending in the United States courts suits brought by the Attorney General against clerks on their bonds for fees which he has claimed have been illegally collected, but which the clerks claimed was theirs by right. Under the old system, where they have both the United States circuit and the United States district courts, the maximum allowed to the clerks from the fees collected was $7,000 a year, and the amount paid for the salaries of the clerks was much larger than it will be under the new system when the maximum salary is $4,500. The salary system will be much more satisfactory, and while these salaries are not large, it is supposed that under the circumstances it will be fair and reasonable remuneration for the service which is rendered.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. The fees will be charged for services performed by the clerk, as usual?

Mr. TOWNER. The fees will be all charged and conveyed into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MOORE. And the clerk will have personal control of those fees until they are delivered to the United States Treasury?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. And there will be just that little element of risk as between those who pay the fees and the Treasury? That is to say, they will be in the personal custody of the clerk for a time?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; or of his deputies, principally.

Mr. MOORE. He will collect them, but he is directed under the amendment, as I understand, if it should pass, to immediately turn those fees into the Treasury?

Mr. TOWNER. Well, they are all accounted for under the rules which the Attorney General has prescribed, and, of course are turned into the Treasury of the United States; I can not say immediately, but under the rules which the Attorney General prescribed.

Mr. MOORE. Does not the gentleman think it would be well to have a time limit?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not, for the reason that there is so much variation in conditions, and for the reason that the same time limit on a clerk of a court in California or in the State of Washington and one who is compelled to account for fees in the city of Washington certainly would not be within reason.

Mr. MOORE. The fees in the city of Philadelphia—I am speaking of the city government—are collected during the day and turned into the treasury at the close of business of that day.

Mr. TOWNER. They are all subject to the regulations that the Attorney General will prescribe in these cases, and, of course, they will be reasonable and applicable to each particular locality and court.

Mr. MOORE. Yes; but there is no longer any personal interest of the clerk in the fees collected.

Mr. TOWNER. The intention of the amendment is to prevent that.

Mr. MOORE. I would like to see the amendment provide that at the expiration of a week or a month all fees should be turned in. I think perhaps a month would be a reasonable period. Perhaps the law ought to fix that.

Mr. STAFFORD. If my colleague will permit, as the gentleman is aware, the amendment provides for the accounting every quarter for all fees that are collected during that quarter.

Mr. MOORE. Well, I have known of instances where fees have been put in a bank or trust company that has dissolved, thus involving the clerk.

Mr. STAFFORD. The risk will be upon the clerk to select his own depository.

Mr. MOORE. The responsibility is on the clerk, because he has given a bond to protect this fund which is in his hands.

Mr. MANN. He will still have to deposit in a national depository.

Mr. MOORE. I know; but I happen to have knowledge of several cases where funds are being made good under bonds by reason of the fact that there was discretion left to the clerk in holding over these moneys. The clerk, as well as the Government, ought to be relieved, so far as possible, from the risk of loss due to the holding of these fees for any great length of time. I am not saying that any clerk would do this. No self-respecting clerk, of course, would. But there have been instances where that has been done, and if the law compelled a clerk—and the clerks will be satisfied with this, I am sure—to turn that money over within a given period the temptation to misuse it or to lose it would be gone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more. I want to ask some questions of my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. TOWNER] proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Do I understand you to say you approve the salaries that are fixed here by this report?

Mr. TOWNER. I would not say as to any individual salary.

Mr. HAUGEN. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to page 21 of the report. I find that in the northern district of Iowa there are 345 cases pending, while in the southern district there are only 332 cases, and the salary for the clerk of the northern district is $3,000, while the salary of the clerk in the southern district is $4,500. I am thoroughly in accord with the idea of fixing salaries instead of fees, but I would like to see a better adjustment of salaries.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman, as I said a little while ago, that these salaries are subject to revision in any individual instance. In this case, as I understand it, a change has been made since the original fixing of salaries in this bill by the Clayton bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. In the northern district the salary is $3,000, while in the southern district it is $4,500.

Mr. TOWNER. The northern district of Iowa is now extended so that it has more work to do than before.

Mr. HAUGEN. This county has been transferred from the southern district to the northern district, so that the northern district has more work.

Mr. TOWNER. I am not sure but that the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of the last Congress the Committee on the Judiciary was elected, with the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Clayton, as chairman. He has recently been appointed and has assumed the duties of office as Federal judge in Alabama, and I beg to say, as an introduction to what I wish to say about this proposition, that in my experience in this House I think the Committee on the Judiciary never had a better chairman than Mr. Clayton. [Applause.]

Personally I appreciate the fact that in a new country it is often necessary to pay upon a fee system, where the business is sporadic or spasmodic, and no one can tell what the salary ought to be. But as time goes on and the country becomes more thickly settled and business becomes more steady in offices I think the fee system ought to be abolished wherever it can be and a salary system put in its place.

There was some bill introduced in the last Congress which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary—I do not recall now just what it was or whether it was reported—but at any rate it led to a conference or conversation between the chairman of that committee, Mr. Clayton, and myself, and I urged—and the urging was not necessary—that he proceed with a bill which would put the United States clerks of district courts upon a salary basis instead of upon a fee system. There was a bill reported from his committee—or possibly not reported; I am not sure; if not, he introduced such a bill—leaving the salaries without any amounts in them, and afterwards, or maybe before, he took the matter up with the Attorney General's office and obtained a large amount of information and fixed a schedule of salaries in a bill which was reported to the House in the last Congress.

I assured Mr. Clayton at that time that I would do everything within my power to help him pass through the House a bill which would adopt the salary system instead of the fee system in these clerks' offices and that I thought the minority side of the House would all practically stand together upon that proposition. It would seem that everybody was in favor of it, and the bill has been introduced and reported by Mr. Clayton in this House.

I hope that we may some day reach that bill and pass it. But meanwhile I am very glad indeed that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] called the attention of the House to the matter in this bill, and that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, who has charge of the pending bill under consideration, has agreed to the proposition and offered an amendment covering the salary system. I think it is a distinct step in advance wherever we can abolish the payment of officials upon a fee basis and put them upon a salary basis. There may be some controversy as to the amounts of salary to be paid to these clerks. I think the bill in the last Congress was sent to every clerk in the United States, and so far as I know there was no general objection to it. There may have been one or two cases or more where clerks thought they ought to have higher salaries. I suppose it is inevitable that some clerk would like to have his salary raised as high as the salary of some other clerk. We do not pay very high salaries at the best. So I congratulate the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] on doing what he has done, and I have made these remarks because I thought the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Clayton, was entitled to receive credit for this reform, which is a distinct and valuable reform.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, after section 68: After the words "clerk for the northern district of the State of Iowa," strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,500."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment would be to raise the salary of the clerk of the northern district of Iowa from $3,000, as embodied in the committee amendment, to $3,500.

The reason I have for offering this amendment is that in the northern district of Iowa the business is growing very rapidly. The northern half of the State is the new half of the State, and while a considerable discrepancy between the two districts years ago would have been equitable, it no longer is so.

Again, one quite populous county has recently been transferred from the southern to the northern district, which includes one of the small cities in the State, which also lessens the work in the southern district and increases it in the northern district.

The salary of the clerk of the northern district as it stands now in my amendment, at $3,500, when compared with the amount of busines done, would still be below the number of other districts in the country, notably in Tennessee and Mississippi and Wisconsin, where the business is much less, but where the compensation in the committee bill is more. I have only asked for an increase of $500, raising the salary to $3,500. I really feel that it ought to be at least $4,000, because it undoubtedly will be entitled to that increase within the next two or three years.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. What does the clerk of your State get per annum, in the same county where the district court is held?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, he gets more than that amount.

Mr. CULLOP. How is he paid—by fees or salary?

Mr. SCOTT. Fees and a limited salary. Fees up to a limit.

Mr. CULLOP. What is the limit?

Mr. SCOTT. I think it is $4,500 in the county.

Mr. CULLOP. Is there not more than twice the amount of business done in that district court than there is in the United States court held in the same county?

Mr. SCOTT. But we have four different divisions in my district.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; but is there not a deputy at each one of the other points where court is held, and does not that deputy transact the business of the clerk at that point?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, that is true all over the whole country.

Mr. CULLOP. Then it does not cause the clerk any additional labor to have different places where the court is held?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, yes; he must attend all the sessions of the court in all the four divisions, and must supervise them all and be responsible for them all.

But I am basing my amendment entirely upon the matter of comparison of that district with the southern district and with the other districts of the country. As the bill is offered it is out of proportion when you come to compare the amount of business that has been done in the past, when you contemplate the business of the future, and, further, in view of this transfer of territory recently from the southern to the northern district.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want to heartily indorse the amendment. I do not know anything about the details of it, but I wish to indorse the policy of it. In my judgment, the States are away ahead of the Federal Government in abandoning the old fee system. For years and years the fee system was an eyesore in my State. It was abused practically by every man who was elected to an office, regardless of politics, until some 20 years ago such an outcry was raised against it that both parties agreed to revise it, and to put all officers upon a straight salary basis.

While it is outside of the subject which we are discussing, I want to take this opportunity to call the attention of the committee to a piece of constructive work done by Mr. Taft that is probably overlooked, and yet I regard it as a piece of real, genuine constructive work. That was the reorganization of the customs districts in the United States. If I remember correctly, the proof before my committee disclosed that there were 37 different ways of paying collectors of customs in the United States—some on the fee system, some on the commission system, and some on the salary system, and I do not know what not. We began an investigation of that matter, and had the earnest, loyal support of Mr. MacVeagh and of Mr. Curtis. In my candid judgment, that entire work was due to the courage and brain power of Mr. Curtis, then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. If I remember correctly, the reorganization as finally put through reduced the collection districts from 149 to something like 47. But an amusing fact to me was this: I had the earnest, loyal support of my committee while we were working on it, but after the election of 1912, when it was perfectly apparent that if the reorganization went through there would be something like 100 jobs abolished that were paying good salaries, many of them absolute sinecures, many of them paying $3,000 a year where they did not take in one dollar's worth of revenue, and in addition to the salary of $3,000 paid to the collector they carried a clerkship or two—immediately before Mr. Taft's term of office expired a fight began to keep him from issuing his Executive order carrying out the directions contained in the sundry civil bill of 1912. From almost every conceivable point of the compass and from every conceivable angle pressure was brought to bear on the President to get him to refuse to issue his Executive order. Under the law, he had to get it to Congress by the 4th of March, 1913.

I desire to state that in that work I had the earnest, loyal, active support of Mr. Hill, of Connecticut. I recollect we had two public hearings at the White House on the subject. At both those hearings Mr. Hill and myself appeared. But the real trouble came in the abolition of the jobs and useless positions; and be it said to Mr. Taft's everlasting credit that on the morning of March 4, 1913, his order reached the House. Now, his rearrangement of the customs districts may not have been perfect. There was some criticism of it, and naturally in the reorganization of such a tremendous piece of political machinery as that every joint could not possibly be shaped and fashioned to fit exactly as it ought to fit. There were some of the most notoriously outrageous things connected with that service that I ever dreamed of in my life. I recollect that at some of those frontier ports on the Canadian border the collectors got from $15,000 to $20,000 a year out of the fee system, selling manifests, and so on. I received a great many letters from that section of the country appealing to me to stand back and out from under the reorganization, and not insist upon the President putting it into force. But through the Executive order issued by President Taft that condition of affairs up there was cleaned up. Everything is upon a fair, square, salary basis, and every collector in the United States is upon a fair, square salary. There were two ports in my State, and there was no use on earth for both. One of them was at Evansville, Ind., where the collector drew a salary of $4,500 a year, the other was at Indianapolis. It was but right and natural that one of those ports should be abolished and make a subport of Indianapolis, which was done. I want simply to take this opportunity of saying that as to this fee system many of the States are far in advance of the Federal Government, and I shall rejoice to see the day come when every man working for the Federal Government will have a fixed and determined salary, knowing just exactly what he is to get when he is either elected or appointed to the position, and I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] will carry, provided the amount is right and not too high.

Mr. WATKINS rose.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] desire recognition?

Mr. WATKINS. I want to understand the parliamentary status.

Mr. MANN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; there is an amendment pending; but the question in my mind is whether an amendment in the third degree is in order now. I do not desire to be unreasonable——

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS]. Now there is an amendment to that amendment, and those are the only amendments pending, as the Chair understands.

Mr. WATKINS. I thought the gentleman from Utah offered an amendment.

Mr. MANN. He is withholding his amendment. He is waiting.

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman from Utah is going to wait, I will speak to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course no further amendment to the amendment would be in order at this time.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that as far as we can possibly do so I would like to stand by the report of the Judiciary Committee, on account of the very careful research which they have made in the hearings had before that committee as the basis of the report which they made on the bill pending to fix the salaries of the clerks throughout the country. I am sure that nearly every clerk will have some little suggestion here and there which he would like to have incorporated as an amendment to the bill, believing that he is not placed exactly on an equality with other clerks. But if we balance it up, taking the average, we will find, as shown by the report of the committee, that as a rule they are placed nearly on an equal level, on a basis of equality so far as it is practicable to put them there.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. This amendment as now offered is the bill reported in this House in this Congress?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I notice that there are a number of discrepancies between the bill as reported in this Congress and the bill reported in the last Congress.

Mr. WATKINS. I have noticed that.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman explain those discrepancies?

Mr. WATKINS. I was going to explain the bill reported favorably to this Congress. There is no use going back to discrepancies in the old report.

Mr. MANN. I mean discrepancies between the two; the amendment now pending, for instance, gives the clerk of the northern district of Iowa a salary of $3,000, while in the last Congress the salary was fixed at $3,500.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know the reason for cutting it down?

Mr. WATKINS. I was going to state that in this report there are two separate recommendations. One reports in favor of the amount stated in the bill, in the Towner amendment which is now pending, and the other part of the report makes a difference of $500, making it $3,500. One is on page 25 of the report and the other on page 35 of the same report. These are discrepancies. I intended to call attention to it and leave it to the House to say what it would do in allowing this amendment to go through.

Mr. MANN. What I was seeking to get information about—I know the gentleman is not a member of the Judiciary Committee—but what was the reason given, if any, for reducing the amount of the salaries of some of the clerks in the bill reported in this Congress from the salaries fixed in the bill reported in the last Congress?

Mr. WATKINS. It was largely as the result of hearings had before that committee, and also from the report received by the departments, and particularly the report from the Department of Justice.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the Department of Justice reported in favor of $3,500 for the northern district of Iowa.

Mr. WATKINS. That former report was based on the law which allowed the clerks to receive fees in the district court and also in the circuit court. The circuits were abolished January 1, 1912, when the act of March 3, 1911, went into effect.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, the bill reported to the last Congress was for the salary of the clerks of the district courts, and was not based at all on the circuit-court salaries.

Mr. WATKINS. The report may have been made after that, but they constantly refer to the amount the clerk was paid in 1911, when fees were being received both for the district and the circuit courts.

Mr. MANN. I understand that part of it, but the district court does all the work of the circuit court and the district court combined now, so that that makes no particular difference. I call attention to the fact that in this report, page 59—I think that was the basis of the bill in the last Congress—the net earnings of the clerk in the northern district of Iowa in 1911 was $4,800.

Mr. WATKINS. Forty-eight hundred and eighty-three dollars and fifty-one cents.

Mr. MANN. And the salary proposed was $3,500.

Mr. WATKINS. I think they intended to report in favor of $3,500 in this bill, but they did not do it.

Mr. MANN. I wondered if it was not more of an inadvertence than anything else.

Mr. WATKINS. In the report on page 34 the gentleman will see that they say they reduced the salary from $4,000 to $3,500, showing that it must have been a clerical error in putting the amount at $3,000.

Mr. MANN. They intended to make the same report in this Congress that they made in the previous Congress in that respect?

Mr. WATKINS. I will not say, but, as far as I have been able to ascertain, that is the only place where an error has occurred, and I propose from this time on to oppose any other amendment changing the amount of salaries fixed by this report. In this particular instance I do not propose to antagonize the amendment, because I think it was a clerical mistake.

Mr. MANN. I think there is one other case where the same condition prevails.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I would like to call attention to the fact that by an act of Congress of March 3, 1913, Carroll County was transferred from the southern district of Iowa to the northern district, which makes 52 counties, and the duties of the clerk have been increased.

Mr. WATKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to be fair and just all the way through, and I shall oppose any other change whether it comes by way of amendment or otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "State of Utah" strike out the figures "$3,000" and insert "$3,500."

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered under precisely the same circumstances as the one just adopted. The report on the bill and the hearings on it show that the clerk of the district court of Utah was regarded as being entitled to $3,500. I have been unable to find upon what basis the report of the committee in the Sixty-second Congress has been changed. It seems that the hearings on that bill are submitted as a basis for the present bill. In these hearings I find on page 31 that Utah has a population of 373,351. The clerk was paid $4,895 in 1911. The salary of the attorney is $4,000. The salary of the marshal is $3,000. And these are the conditions which the committee took into consideration in fixing the present salary of the clerk of the district court of Utah. After a full hearing in the last Congress, the Clayton bill fixed the salary for the district of Utah at $3,500. I ask the chairman of the committee having charge of this bill if he will not consent to this amendment upon the same ground that he accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not find any similarity in the reports, so far as I have examined them.

Mr. HOWELL. The report on the Clayton bill——

Mr. WATKINS. I am not going by the former report, but I am going by the report on this bill, which is the basis for the Towner amendment.

Mr. HOWELL. I am standing with the chairman on that report. The report to which I refer is the basis on which the bill is formulated, and the schedule of salaries is fixed in accordance with the hearings before the committee. There is not a word that I can find to explain the changes that have been made in House bill 867? now reported and offered as an amendment from the bill reported in the Sixty-second Congress. In fact, the report on House bill 8673 sets out the same set of facts upon which the committee recommended the adoption of House bill 21226 in the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. WATKINS. There are many changes in the bill presented in this Congress from the bill presented in the former by the Judiciary Committee for the reason I gave when the other amendment was pending. They had hearings, and as a result of those hearings they ascertained the amounts in many instances were not the correct amounts to be fixed, and the report from the department shows that the work done in the various districts does not justify the amount fixed in the former report on the bill.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the gentleman's attention to this statement in regard to Utah, which is found in the hearings.

Mr. WATKINS. To which report does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HOWELL. In the report on the bill H. R. 8673.

Mr. WATKINS. The report at this session of Congress?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; in the report at this session of Congress.

Mr. WATKINS. Very well.

Mr. HOWELL. I read from the report:

Utah: There are two places of holding court and two offices maintained by the clerk, the total annual collections being about $5,100. There were pending July 1, 1911, 390 civil and criminal cases, and the business is increasing steadily. Population, 373,351. Clerk was paid $4,895.76 in 1911; attorney's salary, $4,000; marshal's salary, $3,500.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, in the amendment which is pending, to which the gentleman refers as the basis for this amendment, the amount of salary earned was nearly twice that amount and the district attorney's salary was much larger. Besides, there were five places of holding court as against two in this instance. There is no similarity, and there is no clerical error that I can see.

Mr. HOWELL. Of course, there is nothing in the report to show why these changes have been made, and I am convinced that the change is a mere inadvertence and ought to be corrected. The clerkship of the Utah district is a position of such importance and responsibility that the salary provided by my amendment is even inadequate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if I can get the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana, in the bill in the last House the salary was fixed at $3,500. The fees that were collected by the clerk and kept by him out of the fees collected in 1911 were $4,895.76. In the statement made by the department to the committee in this Congress there is no reference to any reduction from $3,500 to $3,000 or any suggestion of a reduction from the amount carried in the bill of the last Congress, although I think that in every other case where there was a reduction from the former bill, that is set out in a statement made by the department.

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman will allow me a suggestion, I will state that the facts there show that the places of holding court are only two, and the amount of fees earned and the work done in the court would not justify that additional compensation.

Mr. MANN. On the facts, compared with other cases, here is a case where I think there is an error. There is nothing in the hearings before the committee on this subject, and no discussion in the committee on the subject. In the appendix furnished by the department to the committee, which was the basis of any change made in the salaries, a statement which is quite complete, there is no reference to any proposed change or reduction in this bill introduced in this Congress from the bill introduced in the last Congress. It seems to me there is a fair amount of business in that court.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, in whose time is this discussion being carried on?

Mr. MANN. In my time; and the gentleman will not object to that, I am sure. All we want to do is to have this proper. It is a wonder to me that there is not more trouble about it.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Just one moment. The average gross receipts for 1909, 1910, and 1911 in this district was $5,100, and the department states that this is a district which is rapidly increasing in business. I yield now to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CULLOP. I was going to suggest that the report here shows that in the northern district of Iowa there is a population of more than a million.

Mr. MANN. But we are not talking about that.

Mr. CULLOP. No; but, as I understand, the gentleman is comparing the fees of the clerk of the court in Utah with the fees of the clerk of the court for the northern district of Iowa.

Mr. MANN. I was not, but I am perfectly willing to.

Mr. CULLOP. If the gentleman will notice, there is not only a larger amount of business, but there are five different places of holding court, while there are only two in Utah, and the population is nearly four times as great in that district. That ought to make some difference in the amount of fees.

Mr. MANN. Utah is a large State, and there is a considerable amount and a very rapidly increasing amount of business. I do not seek to have these fees put up over what the committee recommended, but here is a case where the Judiciary Committee after consideration recommended $3,500 and so reported. In all of the other cases where they have made any change they have given a reason for it.

In this case they have given no reason for proposing a reduction, and I think it was an inadvertence on the part of somebody who prepared the figures. It may have been an inadvertence in the Printing Office or an inadvertence of the clerk or an inadvertence of a Member of the House, but plainly it was an inadvertance, because it did not make any recommendation to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana that there is an amendment offered to page 54. Does he desire to dispose of that now?

Mr. WATKINS. If these others have been disposed of, it would necessarily follow; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 54, line 2, after the word "sixty-one," insert the word "sixty-eight."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 106. The competency of a witness to testify in any civil action, suit, or proceeding in the courts of the United States shall be determined by the laws of the State or Territory in which the court is held.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 65, line 3, after the word "civil," insert the words "or criminal."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, before we discuss this amendment there are some provisions in this very codification here, some in conflict with the idea, and I would ask the gentleman if he could modify it in such way as to incorporate this view, that where it does not conflict with the other provisions of this law? Now, take the next page and you will find there the case of bigamy and other cases, and the husband can not be a witness for or against the wife and the wife can not be a witness for or against the husband except on certain conditions. This is something we expect to pass. If that provision is allowed to stand and this provision is allowed to stand we will have two separate and distinct provisions conflicting with each other. Then there are States where the husband and wife would be allowed to testify, and there are some States, like the State of Louisiana, where they are not allowed to testify, and if the case should go to the United States court in Louisiana they would not be allowed to testify under the gentleman's amendment, and under the other provisions of this law they would not be allowed to testify. There is a conflict, and if the gentleman will qualify his amendment in such a way as to say where it does not conflict with other provisions of this statute it will be all right, but unless there is some qualification made it will bring about confusion.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the amendment was again reported.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I would like an opportunity to explain my amendment before my time is all taken up.

Mr. CULLOP. The question I was going to ask was an explanation of the amendment and therefore I will not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. The purpose of this amendment, Mr. Chairman, is to make the laws of the State, where the Federal court is held, determine the competency of witnesses in criminal cases as well as in civil cases. My attention was called to the need for this amendment by one of the prominent lawyers at home, who has an extensive practice in the Federal and State courts. It appears that in the Federal court in criminal cases the old common-law rule prevails, so that a husband or wife can not testify in favor of the other, and the purpose of this amendment is to allow the husband or wife to testify in Federal courts in favor of the other provided the State law, where such court is held, gives that right.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say the Federal courts hold they can not testify?

Mr. MAPES. That is my understanding of the law.

Mr. MANN. Or can not be compelled to testify, which?

Mr. MAPES. The district judge of the western district of Michigan is a very competent and able judge and lawyer, and has held that they can not so testify, I am told.

Mr. MANN. Well, the present law reads this way.

Mr. MAPES. I would like in further answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois to read an extract from a letter which I received from a lawyer at home.

Mr. MANN. I will read the law later, although I thought perhaps the gentleman would not want to read the letter after the law was read.

Mr. MAPES (reading)—

In our State courts you understand the rule to be that the husband and wife are competent to testify for each other in all actions, both civil and criminal. The Federal courts follow the common-law rule in criminal cases, and therefore the wife or husband is not a competent witness for the other. At this day and age there is no reason for following the common-law rule, as it very often works a very grave injustice.

And he goes on to state—

We recently had an occasion to defend a lady charged with embezzling from the mails. Her husband was a very material witness in her behalf, but we were unable to call him because of the holdings of the Federal court.

And I will say further for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois that a very prominent criminal case was tried since this letter was written in our Federal courts at home, and according to the newspaper dispatches the wife in that case was not allowed to testify in favor of the defendant, her husband.

Mr. SCOTT. But the gentleman's amendment goes entirely beyond that and makes the similarity general; in other words, that the State rule shall cover all cases.

Mr. MAPES. I can see no objection to incorporating the provision suggested by the chairman of the committee, that such rule should prevail unless there is some Federal statute to the contrary. In fact, I think it would be advisable to add a proviso of that kind.

Mr. GARNER. May I interrupt the gentleman by asking what objection can there be to a wife or a husband testifying in any case that is being tried before the court when the jury is to determine the weight to be given to the testimony?

Mr. SCOTT. Of course the reason has been elemental for a great length of time that the wife or husband should not be permitted to testify against each other.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAPES. I would like to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT] that I am not asking that the husband or wife be allowed to testify against each other, but in favor of each other, or that one be allowed to testify in favor of the other provided the State law allows them to do so in the State courts in the State where the Federal court is held.

Mr. SCOTT. I understood that your amendment simply makes the State law prevail as to the competency of witnesses generally, and not merely husband and wife, on all questions.

Mr. MAPES. Yes; on all questions.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] that I considered the matter as an amendment to that section of the statute, but found it would be inapplicable for the purpose which I think the gentleman has in mind, and I think an amendment which I will offer to the next section will reach the difficulty which the gentleman has in mind, and which I believe ought to appeal to the committee to support.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I overstated the case a while ago. The limitation in the present law is as to testifying in cases of bigamy, polygamy, and unlawful cohabitation. If that language were stricken out, then that permits the husband or wife to testify except as to confidential communications between each other.

Mr. MAPES. I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, that I have introduced a special bill which provides for an amendment to this particular section. It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, but, as we all know, they have been working on the trust legislation, and the chairman of the subcommittee to which this bill was referred said he would take it up just as soon as they disposed of the trust legislation. Without attempting to bind or speak for any member of the Judiciary Committee, I will say that the one or two members of that committee with whom I have talked thought that this ought to be the law, and I think the chairman of this committee has no objection to it.

Mr. WATKINS. I think if you put in the amendment the language "except as herein provided," I would have no objection to it. If we incorporated that in the amendment, it would be better.

Mr. MAPES. I am perfectly willing to agree to that suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] ask to change his amendment to meet that suggestion?

Mr. WATKINS. Just add to it "except as herein provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

Mr. MAPES. Would it not be better to put that after the paragraph?

Mr. GARNER. Let it follow the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 65, line 5, after the word "held," insert the words "except as herein otherwise provided."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, does it not include the word "criminal" farther up now? Let us hear the whole amendment reported.

Mr. MAPES. The first amendment was to insert the words "or criminal" after the word "civil."

Mr. WATKINS. Let the Clerk read the section as amended and we will understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the section as it is proposed to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 106. The competency of a witness to testify in any civil or criminal action, suit, or proceeding in the courts of the United States shall be determined by the laws of the State or Territory in which the court is held, except as herein otherwise provided.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on that amendment. The exception "except as herein otherwise provided" is designed to protect and make effective the provision, among others, in section 108 on the next page——

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Which provides that in these cases of bigamy, polygamy, and unlawful cohabitation the wife or the husband may be called to testify against the other——

Mr. BARTLETT. Lawful wife.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, we are not talking about unlawful wives, surely. It says they shall be called to testify the one against the other.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the language of the statute.

Mr. BRYAN. She will testify or he will testify as he or she chooses to testify, but in no case can he or she be compelled to testify. Now, I do not like that proposition myself. I believe that if there are any cases wherein a wife or a husband ought to be required to tell the truth as he or she knows it, it is in this very kind of cases. There has been quite a discussion of that proposition. Of course, it has been discussed from time immemorial, but the English law has been amended so as to include a whole string of cases in which this kind of testimony is permitted. Where a woman, for instance, is not required to testify against her husband, if her husband objects, you put a restriction on her testimony that is not fair; or if you put her in the position before the court that she is not a compellable witness, and if she testify, she does it at her own choice, then you put her in an awkward position.

The gentleman referred to the law of Louisiana. I heard a distinguished daughter of Louisiana speak on one occasion about a case of incest in the State of Louisiana, where the mother, or, at least, the wife, who was the aunt of the victim, was anxious to testify, but her testimony was no good in court because of these restrictions, because she was the wife of the criminal who committed the crime.

Now, I think there ought to be no restriction on the testimony of a woman against her husband or on the testimony of a man against his wife in cases of crime unless we save this proposition of privileged communications, not permitting one to testify against the other as to a privileged communication.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I understood the gentleman, he wanted to make it so that a wife or husband could be required to testify?

Mr. BRYAN. Could be required to testify as to anything in a civil or criminal action except a privileged communication received from the other spouse.

Mr. MANN. Take a case where a man is accused of some crime, and he is not required to testify.

Mr. BRYAN. I know that.

Mr. MANN. And you are not permitted to comment on the fact that he is not permitted to testify.

Mr. BRYAN. That is good law.

Mr. MANN. And would you still compel it to be drawn out of his wife by compelling her to testify?

Mr. BRYAN. If her husband has made communication that is privileged in common law to the wife, he ought to be protected; but if the wife of John Jones knows that he stole a shoat from his neighbor, and he is arrested for stealing that shoat, she ought to be a competent witness.

Mr. MANN. Why should the wife of a man be compelled to testify where the man himself could not be required to do so?

Mr. BRYAN. For the simple reason that they are two entirely independent individuals.

Mr. MANN. That is the gentleman's mistake. We have not come to the free-love system yet. They are equal under the law in many respects.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman says we have not come to the free-love period. I suppose the gentleman abhors the idea of coming to the free-love period?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. BRYAN. And I think all decent men do. I suggest to the gentleman that if he thinks permitting a woman to testify against her husband or a husband against his wife would induce a free-love period he is simply wide of the mark. There is no connection and no reason in any such argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that I may proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. In the State where the gentleman lives is the husband permitted to testify against his wife, or is the wife permitted to testify against her husband?

Mr. BRYAN. There is a restriction or limitation placed similar to these other restrictions.

Mr. BUTLER. You have the common-law rule in your State?

Mr. BRYAN. No; we have a statutory rule.

Mr. BUTLER. By that statute they are not enabled to testify against each other?

Mr. BRYAN. The law reads as follows:

The husband shall not be examined for or against his wife without the consent of the wife, and the wife shall not be examined for or against her husband without the consent of the husband, nor during marriage without the consent of either as to any communications made by one to the other during marriage, but this exception shall not apply to a civil action or proceedings by one against the other nor to a criminal action or proceedings for crime committed by one against the other.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ffom Washington yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. That statute specifically specifies that the wife shall not be compelled to testify against the husband or the husband against the wife under any circumstances, except by the permission of the party defendant. Now, the gentleman wants to enlarge that by Federal statute and take it further than any statute of any State in the Union.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes. I want to take it further than the State statute.

Mr. GARNER. It is to be hoped that an action in the gentleman's State or in any other State will never go to that extent.

Mr. BRYAN. There were recently quoted in an article in the Washington Post, under the head "Cite feminist words—Suffrage foes would prove 'free-love' advocacy," the purported opinions of several persons. The article begins:

Do you know what a "feminist" is? Many persons have admitted their ignorance regarding this, and, as a result of numerous queries received, it is said, by the National Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage, that organization, through its press agents, issued yesterday a statement on the subject. It is sought by them to prove that feminism is about equivalent to "free love."

Then follows a statement of the opinions quoted.

Now, then, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that in the great State of Illinois the right of women to participate in the making of the laws of the State has been established firmly, and that right can never be taken away from them there, and so elsewhere over this country to a great extent that right has been established. But I want to call your attention to the fact that in every State where women do have the right to vote the very first thing they try to do is to take away from the statutes these special protections that are given to men in the commission of crimes of this kind. It is all nice enough to say that a man can not testify against a woman and a woman can not testify against a man, but the party that is up for trial is nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of one thousand the man. It is very seldom that a woman is accused of a crime like that, and I say that the law ought to be so framed that a woman, when she knows her husband has committed a crime, especially one of that kind, should not only be permitted to testify, but compelled to testify, saving alone as to confidential communications made during the intimacy of the marriage relation.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is trying to make the distinction or impression here that in States where women have the right to vote they are undertaking to make a difference or distinction between the man and the woman about testifying. They are on an equality now under the law in this particular.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. GARNER. Do you want to make them unequal?

Mr. BRYAN. They are on an equality on the face of the papers, but, as a matter of fact, there is the grossest inequality.

Mr. MANN. Of course the man is always the inferior.

Mr. BRYAN. He is not inferior when they get into court. I think the only thing that should be advanced here is an opportunity for a fair trial and conviction of crime when guilty and acquittal when innocent; and why in the world a crime like that of incest should be protected from the testimony of the woman who knows about it, and the husband allowed to go scot free, I can not understand, or why his wife, who desires to testify against him in a crime of that kind, shall have any restrictions imposed upon her being heard and the jury informed that if she testifies she simply does it from her own choice, I can not see. There should not be any such restriction. They should be removed. That is what I favor and that is what the women in the suffrage States insist on. But I understood that the Democratic Party is not a party of protection anyhow. But here we will have, when we consider section 108, an effort to reenact a law designed almost solely to protect the lowest class of criminals. Will the Democratic Party stand for that?

Mr. WATKINS. The only question is whether the words "or criminal" should be added after the word "civil." I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman, on that proposition.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word. I call the attention of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] to what he is discussing there, section 108, concerning the testimony of the wife, and I suggested to him the "lawful wife" or "lawful husband," and he expressed great ignorance of the fact that that section did contain the words "lawful wife" or "lawful husband." I desire to call the attention of the committee to section 108 to show that I was correct and knew what I was talking about. In that section the language appears "the lawful husband or wife of the person accused shall be a competent witness," and in using the words "lawful husband or wife" I was absolutely correct, even if the gentleman was surprised that the words should be used in the section.

Mr. BRYAN. After all, what is accomplished by it? We were only talking about lawful wives. I told the gentleman it was immaterial.

Mr. BARTLETT. What the gentleman thinks or says is absolutely immaterial to me. I simply read it for the purpose of showing that when I used the words "lawful husband or wife" I was using the language of the present law, of this bill. I was accurate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 107. In the trial of all indictments, informations, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes, offenses, and misdemeanors in the United States courts, Territorial courts, and courts-martial and courts of inquiry, in any State or Territory, including the District of Columbia, the person so charged shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be a competent witness; but his failure to make such request shall not create any presumption against him.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WATKINS:

Page 66, line 8, after the word "witness," insert: "but for or against himself and for or against any codefendant, and the giving of testimony without objection from the witness himself shall be deemed equivalent to a request by him to testify."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment explained.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a very important amendment, and I think the purpose of it should be explained.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have it read again. I was trying to listen to it, but I could not hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the reason for offering this amendment is this: In the case of Frank M. Ryan against The United States several questions arose, one as to the effect of evidence from the standpoint of immunity. As a result of the decision in that case, because of statements made by codefendants, the Department of Justice thought that the latitude ought to be a little broader than it is in the original law, which is the section we are now considering. It is in response to the suggestion of the Department of Justice that the amendment is to be inserted at this place. As a general proposition the immunity granted to defendants who testify is entirely too broad under the law as it now exists. In cases where a man voluntarily makes statements which affect him, he should be granted immunity from prosecution. He should not be forced to testify. The Department of Justice does not give any very extensive reason why it suggests that this amendment be inserted, but the Ryan case is cited as a precedent and a reason why the amendment should be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division, demanded by Mr. WATKINS, there were—ayes 28, noes 5.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, line 9, after the word "him," insert the following:
"Provided, That in any case where the defendant fails to testify in his own behalf, the court shall instruct the jury that no inference shall be drawn in considering the case against the defendant."

Mr. BUTLER. That is the law everywhere.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, in the trial of criminal cases in many instances the defendant does not take the stand and testify in his own behalf. The provision of law now is that no inference shall be drawn against the defendant for his failure to testify in his own behalf; but if the court does not instruct the jury that such is the law, in a great many instances the jury will not know that such is the law, and therefore they will take that as a circumstance against him, because he did not testify; and in very many instances that might be the controlling factor which would lead the jury to render a verdict against him. In many of the States where a statute like this prevails, there is a provision exactly like the one I have offered.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he ever knew of a court failing to give that instruction?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; I have.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is something new to me.

Mr. CULLOP. In the State from which the gentleman migrated to the State where he now lives there is a statute precisely like this. I have known courts to refuse to give that instruction. In one particular case, a homicide case, the court being orally requested to give that instruction, refused to give it, and when the case was appealed and that fact was alleged as reversible error, the Supreme Court held that the request was not made before the argument began, and therefore it came too late, and the case was affirmed on that kind of a technicality.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was the fault of the lawyer.

Mr. CULLOP. No; it was not the fault of the lawyer, because the lawyer had a right to suppose that the court would give the jury the instruction the statute required him to give, and he had no way of knowing, until after the court had instructed the jury, that the court would not follow the mandate of the statute.

Mr. WINGO. In what State was that?

Mr. CULLOP. The case I refer to is one of the adjudicated cases in the State of Indiana some 25 or 30 years ago. There the statute requires the request for instructions to the jury to be in writing, and that the request must be made in writing before the argument begins. Therefore the court affirmed that case on the technicality that the request was not made in seasonable time.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the statute of Indiana requires the judge to instruct the jury as he has stated?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. And yet, the judge having failed to do what the law directed him to do, the Supreme Court held that he could not be reversed because the lawyer had failed to ask him to do what the law compelled to do?

Mr. CULLOP. Precisely.

Mr. BUTLER. That is a strange decision.

Mr. CULLOP. That is exactly the proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. And yet the lawyer had a right to anticipate that the judge would do what the law directed him to do.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; but the statute left the censure, if any there was to be given, upon the trial judge, because the plain mandate of the statute was that a request for instructions must be in writing, and must be made before a certain stage in the trial was reached.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; but as I understand the gentleman to state, the statute specifically directed that the court must on his own instance so charge the jury.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; it certainly did; but the failure of the court to do so did not abrogate the other provision of the statute that the request must be made in writing before the argument.

Mr. BUTLER. But how could the lawyer know that the court would not do his duty?

Mr. CULLOP. He could not, and therefore the censure should not have fallen upon the court. The trial judge who tried this case afterwards became a celebrated lawyer in the State of the gentleman from Washington. The Indiana statute requires a fixed time within which the request must be made. It requires the request to be made in writing before the argument is begun. The request for this specific instruction was not made, and for this reason the failure of the court to give it was not reversible error. Unless the jury is advised of the law on this proposition inferences by the jury may be drawn against the defendant, and may be the cause of his conviction. Prudence, I insist, requires the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to see if I understood the gentleman correctly. As I understood him, the Supreme Court of Indiana held that where the statute required the judge to instruct the jury, and the counsel for the defendant did not make that request, the supreme court held that therefore the judge was not compelled to comply with the statute.

Mr. CULLOP. No; the gentleman does not understand the proposition exactly right. The supreme court held that while it was the duty of the trial court to give that instruction under the statute, yet having failed to do it, and the request of counsel to have it done not having been made in seasonable time as required by the statute, it was not reversible error. Now, the adoption of this amendment will avoid difficulties of that kind and will require the court to give that instruction to the jury whenever a case arises.

And if the defendant in any case failed to take the witness stand and testify in his own behalf, it would be the imperative duty of the court to inform the jury that because of that failure no inference of guilt or innocence shall be drawn against the defendant, nor shall the matter be discussed by the jury.

The law surrounds a defendant with the presumption of innocence. That is a wise and humane provision, and all legislation necessary to uphold and enforce it should be adopted and constantly carried into effect. This amendment will assist in carrying out this policy of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CULLOP) there were 7 ayes and 8 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, would it be proper to inquire how the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] voted on this question? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. No. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TRIBBLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3112. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain right of way near Engle, N. Mex.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 264. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the Sixth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations.

REVISION OF THE LAWS—JUDICIARY TITLE.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 108. In any proceeding or examination before a grand jury, judge, justice, court, or United States commissioner, in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, the lawful husband or wife of the perso accused shall be a competent witness, and may be called, but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be; and such witness shall not be permitted to testify as to any statement or communication made by either husband or wife to each other, during the existence of the marriage relation, deemed confidential at common law.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, line 12, after the word "prosecution," strike out remainder of the paragraph and insert the following: "or in any action or trial under any statute of the United States the husband shall be a competent and compellable witness against the wife, and the wife shall be a competent and compellable witness against the husband without restraint or limitation on account of the marriage relation existing between them, except that neither spouse in any criminal proceeding can be compelled to testify as to any statement or communication made by either spouse to the other during the existence of the marriage relation deemed confidential at common law."

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment may conclude in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment be concluded in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. I object to that for the present.

Mr. LLOYD. But I will give the gentleman from Washington all the time.

Mr. BRYAN. I rather doubted the real purpose of the gentleman's request.

Mr. LLOYD. I ask unanimous consent that debate may be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, if the gentleman insists on limiting debate, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Missouri give me two minutes?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in seven minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not see why any limitation should be put upon debate now.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment be closed in seven minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. I make the point of order that that is out of order at this stage.

Mr. LLOYD. Very well, I will wait until the gentleman gets through.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, this leaves the law, if my amendment is adopted, as to confidential communications between husband and wife as it is now. It takes out the provision in the criminal action that the wife can testify against the husband if she wants to, and strikes out the question of consent of the husband. I believe there ought to be no restriction on the right or duty of a wife to testify against a husband or a husband to testify against a wife as to the facts which constitute evidence in a criminal proceeding. I do not believe that there ought to be any protection thrown around them in any case where a man is brought before the court accused of bigamy. It is seldom that a woman is ever accused of bigamy. A man is being tried and his wife is a competent witness, it says in this act, but shall not be required to testify in such a proceeding without the consent of her husband. That is absolutely silly, it seems to me; it is ridiculous, it is absurd, it is abhorrent to any idea of justice to say that a man being tried for bigamy before a court, if his wife is brought in to tell what she really knows to prove the act of bigamy, that she can not testify unless her husband says, "Now, Mandy; you go and tell the truth." In other words, at any time when the man is guilty his wife can not testify unless she will agree to swear falsely; but if he is innocent, or if she will perjure herself for him, she can testify.

Mr. WATKINS. Has the gentleman noticed the provision in line 15, "but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding"?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; I may have stated the case a little strong; but it brings the woman into court and says to her, "You do not have to testify; you are not compelled to, and if you do testify you will do it voluntarily," and it puts a restriction on proving a case against the criminal, a privilege that he ought not to have. I do not see why a bigamist or a rapist should have any privileges other than to have justice and a fair trial under fair rules of evidence, and if a wife knows that he has committed bigamy or the other awful crime, why not let her testify without any legal reservations? Why inform her that she does not have to testify, although all other witnesses must testify? The State wants the truth and the whole truth, but this act would shield the criminal.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. What would happen in the event the wife, seeking a divorce, should take advantage of an opportunity to testify against her husband so that it would involve his imprisonment, which in certain States would serve as a cause for divorce?

Mr. BRYAN. Does the gentleman mean to say that a wife could not testify against a husband in any civilized country in that regard? A divorce proceeding is a civil case and is not in point here.

Mr. MOORE. I do not see why the gentleman wants to force a wife to testify against her husband. It would be easy, if the wife wanted to get rid of her husband, to thus establish grounds for a divorce.

Mr. BRYAN. Would it not be easy for a son who wanted to get rid of his father to testify against him, or a friend who wanted to get rid of another friend? It would seem that the marriage relation itself is much more protection than should exist in fact. The natural love of the wife for a husband protects him.

Mr. BUTLER. But the friends are not married.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman makes an exception in his own amendment in the relations——

Mr. BRYAN. I make an exception as to confidential communications.

Mr. MOORE. What does the gentleman mean by confidential communications between husband and wife?

Mr. BRYAN. I do not believe that a court ought to call a husband or a wife and say, "Did your wife tell you thus and so on a certain day," or to the wife, "Did your husband tell you this," and thereby search the proceedings in the home in an inquisitorial proceeding. But I believe when a woman knows a series of facts that are material, that ought to be told to the court, from other parties, or from things she has seen or heard, concerning the matters involved, or where the man knows facts, if the woman is on trial—and it is very few instances where the woman is on trial—that those facts ought to come out, and there ought not to be any restriction in cases of bigamy and incest and such crimes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee his interpretation of the present statute as set out in lines 15 to 17, inclusive. It says there that the husband or the wife shall not be compelled to testify without the consent of the husband or the wife, as the case may be. Does that mean this, that if a man is on trial and his wife is willing to testify she can not testify without his consent?

Mr. WATKINS. No. It means that she can not be compelled to testify without his consent. The word "compelled" is controlling there.

Mr. WINGO. Suppose she is willing to testify?

Mr. WATKINS. If she is willing to testify, all right.

Mr. WINGO. Then, can the court compel her to testify over the objection of the husband?

Mr. WATKINS. No; I do not think so.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the effect of the present provision.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, is not the present law this, that where a man is on trial for any of the offenses mentioned in this section and his wife is willing to testify and the husband objects, then the court can not compel her to testify over the objection of the husband? In other words, does not the word "compelled" practically read "permission"? In other words, she can not testify if the husband objects. Is that true?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. And is it not true in a great many of the States that the rule is this, that where the wife or the husband is the injured party then he or she is a competent witness in these matters? Is the gentleman prepared to state in how many States that is the rule?

Mr. BRYAN. It is the rule in most of the States.

Mr. WATKINS. I am not prepared to state.

Mr. WINGO. In all of the States in which I have practiced that is the rule. The Federal statute is just to the contrary.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the word "compel" there in connection with the evidence of the husband or wife and the consent of the husband or wife, qualifies the language. The language "as the case may be," in connection with the word "compelled," means, if it is a husband who wants to testify, or if it be the wife who wants to testify, and it does not mean that if the wife wants to testify she can not be forced to testify without the consent of the husband, or the husband without the consent of the wife, but could not be compelled, if it were the husband or the wife, as the case may be, meaning that the husband, if he did not want to testify against the wife, could not be forced to do it, or if the wife did not want to testify against the husband, she could not be forced to do it.

Mr. WINGO. Let me see if I understand the gentleman. If a man is on trial for one of these offenses, and his wife is willing to testify but the husband objects, then can the court compel the witness to testify?

Mr. WATKINS. I think so.

Mr. WINGO. Over the objection of the husband?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; because, if you read the language there, "as the case may be," it means if the wife is willing to testify she may testify, but she can not be compelled to testify

Mr. WINGO. In other words, it is not left to the defendant, but entirely with the witness?

Mr. WATKINS. I think so.

Mr. WINGO. Is that the gentleman's contention of what the law is in the Federal courts?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I could not quite understand the gentleman, but as I understand the distinction made, the wife could testify now under the United States rule in favor of the husband?

Mr. WINGO. I have stated no proposition at all. I was asking for information to see what the gentleman's interpretation of the present law is.

Mr. TOWNER. The fact is that under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which is followed in most of the United States courts in the Union, the husband or the wife can not testify in favor of the spouse.

Mr. WINGO. Can the wife testify against the husband?

Mr. TOWNER. No; of course she can not testify against him, but she can not testify either for or against except in this class of cases specified in the section.

Mr. WINGO. I am not talking about the general rule, but I am talking about these specific cases. Take bigamy, for instance. Does the gentleman say that where a man is on trial for bigamy, the wife could not testify against the husband without the consent of the husband?

Mr. TOWNER. Why, certainly. That would be the effect of the statute.

Mr. WINGO. That is all of the information I wanted to get.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HENSLEY). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division. I want to see who are for protection in this matter. I do not stand for bigamy.

Mr. WINGO. I will stand with the gentleman this time.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 2, noes 12.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, line 10, after the word "any," insert the word "case."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think there should be no question but that the amendment should be adopted. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that this refers to a proceeding or examination. Of course the most important thing is the trial of a case. The word "case" should be inserted following the word "any."

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; if the question were asked me as to whether there is an objection, I would state that there is; but even from the gentleman's standpoint it would make no material difference in the use of the language. The word "proceeding" would be a broader word than the word "case," and particularly when it refers to a proceeding before a grand jury. The word "proceeding" is more appropriate than the word "case," because there is not always a case before a grand jury.

Is that the question the gentleman desires answered?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I am adding that word, not striking out the word "proceeding."

Mr. WATKINS. I thought the gentleman was striking out the word "proceeding."

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, no; certainly not. I am just simply adding the word "case," so it will read, "in any case, proceeding," and so forth.

Mr. WATKINS. Does the gentleman insert a comma after the word "any"?

Mr. TOWNER. No; it will not be necessary. Yes; that is all right.

Mr. WATKINS. If a comma is placed there, I do not see any particular objection.

Mr. BRYAN. I would like to ask the gentleman, if you put the word "case" and make it "any case or prosecution," will not you extend it to a civil matter and probably complicate the civil proceedings? If you say, "in any proceeding or in any case" and do not say any criminal case, then you do not know where you get to. I think it is bad enough to have it all mixed up with divorce cases and everything else.

Mr. TOWNER. There is nothing, of course, in that objection at all, because it specifically says to what it applies.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the amendment. The purpose of my rising is to obtain information from the chairman as to the need of this provision at all. Since the chairman has applied the law of evidence as to the competency of witnesses to criminal proceedings as well as civil, when this section was intended to cover the law of evidence so far as husband and wife are concerned, and certain limited criminal proceedings, I direct the inquiry, What is the need now of having this provision in order to apply the laws of the State to all criminal proceedings?

Mr. WATKINS. To begin with, I will state the gentleman is mistaken in reference to the chairman of the committee inserting the language "criminal" in the preceding section.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was absent from the Chamber for a few moments at luncheon and find out it has been accepted, and I desired some information.

Mr. WATKINS. I was very particular about qualifying the language that it did not interfere with the other provision of the statute and the qualification was not particularly opposed by the members of the committee in reporting this bill, but I certainly would have been opposed to it if it had not been qualified, for this reason: This section upon which we are now is a statute of the United States which regulates the character of testimony in reference to husband and wife which shall be given in a case designated. This particular class of evidence in this section was provided for, and if the preceding section had not been amended by putting the word "criminal" in there and leaving in there the qualified form of language, then, when it comes to trying this class of cases by the State court, the evidence would be governed by the laws of the State court, and we want this language to remain in here to protect this particular class of cases, because we want the statute as it is now standing to remain intact in reference to the character of cases described by this particular section.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HENSLEY). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. TOWNER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I think before we have a vote there should be a comma after the word "case," and then it would be all right.

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman will permit, I will ask unanimous consent that the comma may be inserted.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. What was the decision of the Chair on the vote?

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes have it.

Mr. WINGO. What became of the request for a division?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not recognize anybody to call for a division.

Mr. WINGO. Another parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Does a gentleman have to be recognized in order to ask for a division?

The CHAIRMAN. Some one has to ask for a division.

Mr. WINGO. There was one called for, and I rose and would have asked for it if the other gentleman had not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 108. In any proceeding or examination before a grand jury, judge, justice, court, or United States commissioner, in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, the lawful husband or wife of the person accused shall be a competent witness, and may be called, but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be; and such witness shall not be permitted to testify as to any statement or communication made by either husband or wife to each other, during the existence of the marriage relation, deemed confidential at common law.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, line 19, after the word "cohabitation," insert "or violation of the white slave traffic act, being the act of June 25, 1910, chapter 395, page 825, volume 36, United States Statutes at Large."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have that amendment reported again?

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the object of that amendment is simply to add to the list in which this privilege may be granted. The list given consists of "bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation" and the amendment adds to that the further provision that the provisions of this section may apply also to prosecutions under the white-slave traffic.

Mr. WINGO. Take a concrete proposition. If the gentleman's amendment is carried, would it mean that where a man is tried charged with a violation of the white-slave act and his wife was willing to testify and he objected, then the court could compel her to testify?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not. I will say to the gentleman, however, that that is not altogether clear, because the language is "shall not be compelled to testify." The court could not compel her to testify. I think it would be necessary for her to claim the privilege, and I do not believe in such a case as that, and under the provisions of this section the husband's protest could have any force or avail at all.

Mr. WINGO. I do not think the gentleman gets the point. A man is on trial and his wife is willing to testify, but the man objects; then under this law the court could not compel the wife, over the objection of the husband, to testify.

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly not. That is a diversion from the explanation I desire to make in regard to this necessity for this section of the statute.

I want to call attention, Mr. Chairman, to a statement made by a United States district judge from his experience as to the necessity for this character of legislation. He says in the recent letter to me:

> Section 108 of your proposed new code provides that the wife of an accused may be called but not compelled to testify against the husband in cases of bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation. It seems to me that that clause which provides that she shall not be compelled to testify largely nullifies that which precedes. But that is of no special interest to me, because those cases of bigamy and polygamy, I suppose, seldom arise outside of the Pacific Coast States, like Utah, Nevada, and Idaho.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I will not.

Mr. BRYAN. That is an insult to the Pacific coast, an outrage.

Mr. TOWNER. He says further:

> But there is a matter of very great interest to me, namely, whether the wife shall be allowed to testify against the husband in white-slave prosecutions where the wife is the "white slave." The number of such cases is large. I presume that the past three years I have had an average of four to six per year, and I have been allowing the wife to testify over the objection of the defendant. It is astounding as to the frequency that the wife is compelled to enter into this life of shame and earn money for her degraded husband. Then we have cases where they are not married, but, with the hope of avoiding a prosecution, they get married. A case is now pending in the United States circuit court of appeals for this circuit to review my holding that the wife can testify. Should there be a reversal such announcement will represent an end to the prosecution of the worst class of these cases. Why Congress does not correct this I do not know; perhaps because its attention has not been called thereto.

I will say in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that some of the United States judges are now holding—in fact, most of them are now holding—that in such cases the wife can not be compelled to testify against her husband even when she so desires to do.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. BOOHER. Now, as I understand the gentleman, he thinks that under section 108 as it is now the wife or husband may be called as a witness, but if the wife is called and the husband is on trial she can not be compelled to testify if her husband objects?

Mr. TOWNER. She can not be compelled in any event, whether she raises the objection herself or whether her husband induces her to raise it.

Mr. BOOHER. I am talking about this section. If it is as the chairman of the committee explained to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], then I am opposed to your amendment. But if the law means that the wife, being the injured party in a white-slave act, can be called to testify, then I am for your amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not think there is any question about it; at least there is not in my mind.

Mr. BOOHER. There is in my mind a very serious question about it. The rule is different in the United States courts than in the State courts. In the State of Missouri the rule is that the wife being the injured party is always a competent witness. Why not put it in here now, so that there may be no mistake about it, where in a white-slave case or a bigamy case she is the injured party? Why not permit her to testify whether with his consent or the consent of anybody else?

Mr. TOWNER. I am discussing the question only of adding the white-slave prosecution to this list that is already given.

Mr. BOOHER. But I want to know whether he construes this to mean what the chairman of the committee construes it to mean?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not, if the gentleman has stated it as I understand it.

Mr. BOOHER. Why not make it so that there can be no question about it?

Mr. TOWNER. I have no objection to that. Let the gentleman offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNER. I also desire to call the attention of the committee to a letter which I received from a United States prosecuting attorney in regard to this matter. He says:

> There is one very important matter I want to call your attention to. In my judgment, section 108 should be made specific on the proposition of allowing the wife to testify against the husband in cases under the so-called white-slave act.
>
> We now have pending in the circuit court of appeals an appeal from a case tried in this district, most revolting in its nature, wherein conviction depended absolutely on Judge McPherson's permitting the wife to testify against the husband.
> I am sure, in this district, over half of the cases are those where a man is peddling his own wife. If the circuit court of appeals shall hold as is contended for by the appellant I have in mind, it will nullify the prosecution of the most important cases under the law. It is a very close question as the law now is, because, in order to make it admissible, the courts have to hold that it is on the theory that it is a personal act as against the wife that has been committed.

Mr. Chairman, I think there can be no question about the necessity of adding this class of prosecutions to those already contained in the provisions of the statute as presented by the committee. And I want to make this further statement with regard to the question. I think that in order to bring the United States statutes up to the standard that has been adopted by at least a majority of the States of the Union, we ought in all cases to allow the wife to testify for her husband. That is, so far as I know, the law in every State of the Union.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TOWNER. Just let me finish this, if you will. And we also ought to add a provision in section 108 which will allow in these particular cases, where the offense is at least in part an offense committed against the wife herself, giving the wife the privilege in such cases to testify against the husband.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I am not so much interested, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, in his amendment as I would have been if the amendment had not been made to the first section under this subdivision, and that was that the rules of evidence of the different States, the jurisdiction in which the Federal case was tried, should apply in the competency of witnesses and the admission. In my State the wife or husband is a competent witness for or against the other, except as to confidential communications during the time of their marriage.

Now, can the gentleman give any reason why, if a wife is a competent witness for her husband with or without his consent, she should not be permitted or compelled to testify against him in a criminal prosecution with or without his consent?

Mr. TOWNER. I will not go into that question, I will say to the gentleman. I am not sure but I can go even as far as he does, but the gentleman will understand that this first section under this title was changed. I opposed it in the belief that it is an unwise provision, because I think we ought to put the United States laws on the standard we think justifiable, regardless of the action of the States.

Mr. CULLOP. But will the gentleman yield there? We have made, I will say to the gentleman, some progress in that line, where the rules of evidence by statute, in some of the States at least, are liberal and fair and humane, by the insertion of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the law of most of the States is much more liberal and humane on those subjects than that of the United States at present. And what we ought to do now, I will say to the gentleman, is to put the United States law, independent of what may be the law of the States, on the standard that it should occupy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I think I can agree with the suggestions made in the letters which the gentleman has just read, but I fear that he has misinterpreted the request that has been made of him. I agree with the statement of those letters that this section 108 is vague and is susceptible of the three different constructions that have been placed on it by three different Members this afternoon. I think it ought to be cleared up. My view on this question is this: That in any of these cases the wife or the husband ought to be a competent witness against the husband or the wife, especially in these cases where they are injured parties.

Now, what does the gentleman propose to do by his amendment? As I am informed, in these white-slave cases the court has been permitting the wife to testify, on the theory that she is the injured party, following the rules that most of the States have, that where the wife is the injured party she could testify. But it is owing to the ambiguity of the statute that the gentleman wrote to the gentleman from Iowa concerning the case on appeal.

If you put that in here, as I understand the interpretation of the statute, you will have this: Although the wife may be willing to testify in white-slave cases, if the husband objects they can not compel her to testify. I do not want to see closed the mouths of these women, because on the testimony of the wives in these cases the Government must rest its chances of convicting the defendants.

My idea about it is this: We can follow out the suggestions made in the letters read by the gentleman; we can make the law clear, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] a moment ago, by cutting out the lines 15 and 16, "but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceedings, examination, or prosecution." Then the statute would read this way: "The lawful husband or wife of the person accused shall be a competent witness, and may be called without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be." That would make it clear and make the law speak what the law wants to speak; that is, where the wife or the husband is the injured party, they can be compelled to testify without the consent of the other, except as to confidential communications during the existence of the marriage relation.

Mr. ANDERSON. Would not that same result be accomplished by striking out line 17?

Mr. WINGO. No; I think not; because you would have the line, "but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution." That is what you would have, and that would be unwise and worse than it is now.

Mr. ANDERSON. She could testify, but could not be compelled to testify.

Mr. WINGO. In these white-slave cases I do not think the burden should be placed on the women. In such cases those women are in fear of their husbands, and that is why they have submitted. But I believe the Government's hand ought not to be stayed by these women who are in fear of their lives, and so they ought to be allowed to testify against their husbands. I would favor any amendment that would clear up the statute and place them right where there would not be any question of doubt about it.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I should think that there ought to be stricken out the provision, "but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife."

Now, if gentlemen can give any good reason why the husband or wife should not be a competent witness against each other, except where confidential communications are involved, I am unable to understand. In many of the States of the Union there are statutes enacted to the effect that they are competent witnesses and may be compelled to testify. There are many crimes that can not be apprehended, where convictions can not be had by any other testimony than the testimony of one or the other. The defendant is a competent witness to go on the stand in a criminal case in his own behalf. He is surrounded by the presumption of innocence until he is proven guilty, and the court must so tell the jury, and that presumption must be overcome by evidence of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; and yet the interest of society, they say, would be invaded if you were to compel the wife by statute to testify as to what she knows about the facts in the case, whether for or against the husband.

Now, one of two things must necessarily follow: Either that it is believed that the wife would not be a truthful witness, but would always give testimony in behalf of her husband, and would refuse to disclose the facts, or else that the interests of society need no such protection from violations of law. Now, why prevent the wife, in the interest of enforcing the criminal law, in the interest of protecting society, in the interest of upholding law and decency, from being brought into court and compelled to testify to the fact in a prosecution against her husband? Such is the law in many of the States of the Union to-day, and it has not worked any such troubles in married households as some gentlemen here have thought it as a law would do.

It has not been productive of divorce cases or family disruption or family disorder, but it has been a salutary law, and has tended to the keeping of the criminal laws of the State, to the enforcement of the laws, and sustained prosecutions in which there was merit, and there are many instances where they could not have been made out in any other way whatever.

Now, this amendment offered to section 1 of this subdivision, so far as the law is concerned in my State, makes the rules of evidence conform in the Federal court to the rules of evidence in the State court, and the wife there may be called to testify if the prosecution desires it. She may be compelled to testify, as she ought to. Society is interested in apprehending what the truth is, in ascertaining the facts; and the Government or State ought to be permitted to use every available means at its command, and not be prevented by statute from using any of them that are fair, upright, and honest for the purpose of ferreting out and convicting violators of the criminal laws.

Now, we all admit that the procedure in the Federal courts of this country is an antiquated procedure. It is as old as the Government. No progress has ever been made in it. The same rules apply to instructions to the jury, to taking cases from the jury, to the introduction of evidence, that were brought about in the early stages of the Government. There ought to be a change in this respect, and the Government should keep pace with the States of the Union in this respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] spoke by the card when he spoke of this section and used the term "privilege." The section does embody privileges, and the privileges are privileges in favor of bigamists and in favor of polygamists and those who are accused of unlawful cohabitation and the perpetrators of incest and matters of that kind. His amendment, if adopted, will extend the privilege to the violators of the white-slave act.

It is true enough that the gentleman does not mean to extend the privilege, but this section does extend the privilege. The only excuse for the section is that brought out by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] and others, that polygamy is supposed to be a crime against the woman, for instance, or against the husband, whichever the case may be, and that therefore it does not come within this inhibition.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] brought that out. But that is not the case at all. Bigamy is held by the man judges of this country not to be a crime against the woman at all any more than murder of the husband would be or assault upon the husband. It is not a crime against the woman, and therefore it is not subject to the protection that the gentleman thought. In the case of Bassett v. The United States (137 U. S., 506), which is a widely cited case, where the question of bigamy is involved——

Mr. BOOHER. Does that case hold that a wife is not the injured party in the case where the husband is guilty of bigamy?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. I should like to know what State it is from.

Mr. BRYAN. It is from the United States of America, and was decided by Mr. Justice Brewer.

Mr. BOOHER. Where was the crime committed?

Mr. BRYAN. The crime was committed down near Missouri, in the State of Illinois, I believe. [Laughter.] No; it was a Utah case, but they cite an Illinois case:

> We conclude, therefore, that the section quoted from the Code of Civil Procedure, if applicable to a criminal case, should not be adjudged as working a departure from the old and established rule unless its language imperatively demands such construction. Does it? The clause in the Civil Code is negative and declares that the exception of the incompetency of wife or husband as a witness against the other does not apply to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other. Is polygamy such a crime against the wife? That it is no wrong upon her person is conceded; and the common law exception to the silence upon the lips of husband and wife was only broken, as we have noticed, in cases of assault of one upon the other. That it is a humiliation and outrage to her is evident. If that is the test, what limit is imposed? Is the wife not humiliated, is not her respect and love for her husband outraged and betrayed, when he forgets his integrity as a man and violates any human or divine enactment? Is she less sensitive, is she less humiliated, when he commits murder, or robbery, or forgery, than when he commits polygamy or adultery? A true wife feels keenly any wrong of her husband, and her loyalty and reverance are wounded and humiliated by such conduct.

The law of the United States, as cited in the various State courts, holds that bigamy is not an offense against the woman at all. It is an offense against the public, and so it does not come under this protection.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Does the gentleman know of any State which holds that a woman is not an injured party in a bigamy case?

Mr. BRYAN. The United States holds it, and that extends everywhere throughout this country, and we are only enacting Federal law now.

Mr. BOOHER. The Federal law does not control in the courts of your State or mine.

Mr. BRYAN. Your State took this decision, and the judge there said he was bound by it, and any State court will follow the United States court.

Mr. BOOHER. Oh, no; not against their own statutes or decisions.

Mr. BRYAN. I am talking about these statutes. We provide that the State law shall control, except cases coming under this section 108, and we are thus making a law that will control in this country, above State statutes, where the crime is committed under Federal jurisdiction, and it is attempted now to include violations of the white-slave law, in this specially privileged class; and it is proposed that a woman shall be called as a competent witness in a white-slave case, but shall not be compelled to testify unless her husband consents. In other words, if the husband is innocent he can say, "Wife, testify"; but if he is guilty he will say no. Or if the woman will agree to perjure herself he will say testify; otherwise she is to stay at home. Such a law is an outrage and should be a stench in the nostrils of decent people.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] that the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa would be just the contrary to what he intends, and that if we include violations of the antiwhite-slave-traffic act in this provision, as suggested by his amendment, we will throw the protecting arm of the statute around the husband so as to prevent the wife from testifying. Now, I think a close reading of this section shows that the husband and wife are only qualified to testify in three cases, namely, bigamy, polygamy, and unlawful cohabitation. I have here a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States—Gross v. United States, One hundred and fiftieth United States—in which the Supreme Court positively lays down the rule that a wife is not a competent witness either for or against her husband in a murder trial. The district judges throughout the country have been criticizing this very section. When we were last considering this bill the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDER] read some correspondence from a Federal judge in his district, in which he protested against this limitation of the competency of wife and husband in criminal actions; and it was suggested by his letter that an amendment be proposed so as to enable wives and husbands to become witnesses in all criminal proceedings except these three cases of bigamy, polygamy, and unlawful cohabitation; and he suggested this amendment. I wish gentlemen having the bill before them would follow me, because I intend to offer it as soon as the pending amendment is voted upon.

Strike out, in line 12, the words "for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation" and insert those same words after the word "but" in line 15.

The effect of that transposition will be to make husbands and wives competent witnesses in criminal actions; but there will be this limitation, that in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, they shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be. They will be competent witnesses, but it must be with the consent of the witnesses themselves before they will be competent.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, your proposition is to make husband and wife competent in every class of criminal cases, with the consent of either party, except in these three classes of crimes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is.

Mr. WINGO. Why does the gentleman make a distinction there?

Mr. STAFFORD. They will be competent in these cases, but they must have, first, the consent of the witnesses themselves, the husband or wife.

Mr. WINGO. Now, why do you make that distinction?

Mr. STAFFORD. In this correspondence which I had the pleasure of reading last week this distinguished judge made that recommendation. I have not given it thorough consideration in the midst of other work connected with the business of Congress during the last week, but I can see where in the peculiar domestic relation cases of bigamy, polygamy, and unlawful cohabitation the wife should not be compelled to testify without her consent. I think generally the husband and wife should be competent witnesses in all criminal cases, and that is the purpose of the amendment that I shall offer as soon as this is disposed of.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact that this language in reference to bigamy and unlawful cohabitation found its origin in what is known as the Edmunds Act in reference to polygamy in Utah and western territory?

Mr. STAFFORD. That may be the historical source of it.

Mr. BARTLETT. And if the gentleman's amendment succeeds he will in a great measure weaken the enforcement of the law known as the Edmunds Act against these crimes in Utah and other States where Mormonism has existed.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman probably is in accord with my idea, and that is that the husband and wife shall become witnesses in a criminal action.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think the husband and wife ought not to be permitted to testify for or against one another except for offenses or crimes committed against the person of the other.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman, as far as his position is concerned, is not in accord with the policy in most of the States.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the gentleman restrict that to cases against the person, cases where an attack is made? What kind of cases does the gentleman restrict it to?

Mr. BARTLETT. In my State a husband or a wife can not in a criminal case testify for or against each other except for offenses committed against one another.

Mr. BRYAN. Would that include bigamy?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; it would not.

Mr. BRYAN. You would not want to hear the testimony of a wife against her husband in such a case; you might convict him.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. Is an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is an amendment pending, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. I would like to submit this inquiry or proposition to the gentleman from Louisiana: The gentleman from Louisiana has made one statement as to the law in regard to the competency of husband and wife prevailing in the United States courts. The gentleman from Iowa, Judge TOWNER, has made a different statement. There is confusion as to that proposition. Here is an important provision relating to testimony in courts to be given by the husband and wife, and I want to know if the gentleman from Louisiana would have any objection to passing over this section so that he and other members of the committee can give consideration to the amendments that have been suggested.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have been very indulgent in that matter of passing over sections and then going back, and I find that it consumes too much time and breaks into the succeeding day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Very well.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa under one construction and opposed to it under another. If this amendment is adopted, and then the balance of the section should remain as it is, I do not believe under proper construction of this statute a wife could testify against her husband in a white-slave case. I think everybody agrees in a case of that kind that the wife ought to be a competent witness. I do not know how the crime can be proven without it. Now, if we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, leaving the balance of the section as it is, as I construe the section, the wife could not testify in a case of that character. The courts have held that she can testify, putting it under the common-law rule. I suppose, that she is the injured party and a competent witness. They could not do it under this section of the statute, and there is no statute governing it. If I could be assured that the amendment I shall offer would be adopted, I would vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. Without that assurance I am going to vote against it, because I do not want to deprive the Government of the right to use the wife in cases of this character. After the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is voted upon I will offer another amendment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ANDERSON) there were—ayes 2, noes 6.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, line 15, strike out all after the word "called," in line 15, page 66, down to and including the word "testify," in line 16.

Mr. BOOHER. So that it will read:

The lawful husband or wife of the person accused shall be a competent witness, and may be called in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. I think I agree with the gentleman in his purpose, but if he does that he will interfere with the confidential-relation provision.

Mr. BOOHER. No; that is still in.

Mr. BRYAN. Would it not be better to strike out all after the word "witness," in line 15, down to the word "and," in line 18, so that it would read:

The lawful husband or wife of the person accused shall be a competent witness, and such witness shall not be permitted to testify—

And so forth?

That makes a competent witness of either without the consent of the other.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, how are you going to provide for the competency of the wife in the prosecution under the white-slave act?

Mr. BOOHER. Well, that amendment ought to have been delayed until after this one has been passed upon.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose the gentleman would have no objection to returning to it afterwards to incorporate it.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that I am thoroughly satisfied that these words "unlawful cohabitation" would cover the white-slave cases.

Mr. BRYAN. Not necessarily.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. The amendment just adopted offered by the gentleman from Missouri strikes out these words in lines 15 and 16, "but shall not be compelled to testify"?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out these words in lines 12 and 13, "for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RUSSELL). The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, lines 12 and 13, strike out the words "for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted the statute will then read:

SEC. 108. In any proceeding or examination before a grand jury, judge, justice, court, or United States commissioner in any prosecution under any statute of the United States the lawful husband or wife of the person accused shall be a competent witness, and may be called, but shall not be compelled to testify in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be; and such witness shall not be permitted to testify as to any statement or communication made by either husband or wife to each other during the existence of the marriage relation deemed confidential at common law.

In other words, you would not have any exceptions in the law. As the statute now stands you make an exception in favor of three classes of crime—polygamy, bigamy, and unlawful cohabitation. If you adopt my amendment, it would be simply this, that in any case under any statutes of the United States bigamy, polygamy, the white slave, or illegal cohabitation or anything else, the wife shall be a competent witness against the husband and may be called without the consent of the husband. I can not understand why there should be one rule of evidence with reference to one class of these crimes and another rule of evidence with reference to another class of the crimes that may be of the same generic class but of different statutory expression or denomination.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to speak against the amendment? The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this amendment, and I want to take advantage of the opportunity to say that that is exactly the amendment which I proposed originally, except in somewhat different language, to which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] suggested that there should be only five minutes of debate, and the matter then be forgotten immediately, by inference. That is exactly the amendment that provides for open testimony as to wife or husband, makes each of them competent in any case to testify to all facts except as to privilege communications.

Just one thing more. A while ago when my friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] was reading he read that certain mentioned crimes were committed almost exclusively out on the Pacific coast, and I said that that was a reflection upon the coast. I want to call attention while on this subject to the fact that the Pacific coast—the State of California—furnished the case that was known all over this country and that awakened the conscience of the people all over this country to the necessity of the enforcement of the white-slave act; that the same kind of crime had been committed in other States and had been talked about tremendously, and in other States of the Union, but out there there was opposition, and there was a trial. Such a force of public opinion was felt that the President took the matter in hand and forced a trial of the Diggs-Caminetti cases. Gentlemen on this side of the House said that the prosecuting attorney out there was guilty of demagoguery; that he was playing to public opinion, and that means that public opinion in California decreed that those cases must be prosecuted; that those individuals must be brought to trial. There was a different kind of sentiment in California than existed elsewhere. There was some reason for this different kind of sentiment, and that was this thing that some please to call "feminism." It was a case of the women in California asserting themselves. If you say that that Federal district attorney was a demagogue, you say that public opinion was back of him, for demagogues play to public opinion. If he was honest and faithful and patriotic, and I would say that he was, that he is entitled to all credit, then you again recognize a public sentiment that accorded support to the official. A man can not discharge his duties in this country when public opinion does not back him up. We can not enforce laws that public opinion does not want us to enforce. The truth is the women of California demanded law enforcement—their love of home, of the highest possible conception of home, got into action and put nerve and backbone into the Government official. When you come to the Pacific coast you will find that we are knocking out all of these laws about extraordinary corroboration in crimes against sex morality. We raise the age of consent and enact laws to punish that kind of criminals instead of protecting them, as this bill proposes to do. From the medieval ages all the way down the laws have been designed especially by men to protect them in the commission of this kind of crime. The women are not the guilty ones, and the men who say so are guilty and filthy in their thoughts. The women who gave out a little statement here the other day that I have already mentioned, which was published in the Washington Post and referred to free love and suggested that equal suffrage was complicated with the doctrine of free love, were speaking from filthy minds, and the evil was with them. I wish the authors of that low-down suggestion had been men, so I could go after them. It was contemptible for them to give out any such statement as that, and I have heard that repeated, and we who represent States where women vote are not going to stand for it. The women of our States out there are causing purer laws to be made and are protecting purity in enactments. They are procuring better environments for their boys and are laboring for the establishment of safeguards about their boys.

They are not tending to free love, and any such reference as that is abominable and could only be the product of perverted minds. I am very glad to see that we have finally won this fight on this floor and that this bill is going to be amended as suggested unless the Democratic donkey kicks some Democrats into line that are perhaps now out of the Chamber, and that all these delicious legal privileges for bigamists and rapists and men who violate womanhood will be taken away from them and that they will not be able to hide behind the protection that the wife can not testify unless they allow it; that the wife can not speak against them unless they let her speak; and I am glad to see there is a much better sentiment now on this proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to restore the words "to testify" to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER].

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, that can be attended to in a minute. This amendment seeks to throw down the bars and allow the husband or the wife to testify in any proceeding in court, be it civil or criminal. From the foundation of the world up to the present time the sacred relations between a man and a wife have been recognized and protected. They have been recognized in the marriage ceremony for all time as one—their thoughts, their impulses, their loves, and their affections. There have been safeguards thrown around this marriage tie through the instrumentality of the law from the inception of the law, from the time that civil law was first known, up to the present time. The object of this amendment is to break down that principle of law, which is to establish and maintain the sacredness between the husband and the wife and to perpetuate the sacred relationship in the household. The object is to allow the husband to testify in all instances where the wife is interested and the wife to be called in where the husband is interested, that they may be mutual witnesses one for the other or one against the other.

It will go further toward breaking down the marital relations and disrupt the home than anything that might possibly be conceived of. It is perfectly permissible for the wife to testify or the husband to testify in the cases enumerated in this section which we now have under consideration, because in this section it is the acts denominated there committed, either by the husband or the wife, that are a disruption of the home, a violation of the marriage vows, and a disregard of the sacred relations which exist between husband and wife; but when you go beyond that, when you go out into the wide domain, it may go out into investigations of crime which has been committed and in suits which have been brought, and in allowing the husband and the wife to mutually testify, one for the other or one against the other, you are simply accumulating evidence, because the husband is not expected, except in this section, where the marital relation has been disrupted and the marriage vows have been violated, and there is friction in the family—it is not expected that the husband testify against the interest of the wife, and no true wife would be expected to be placed upon the witness stand to testify against the interest of her husband except in these cases, and the general law has gone far enough, in my opinion, in the section which we have now under consideration. In this connection I wish to say that so far as the amendment which was voted down in reference to the white-slave traffic a while ago, I do not think it is at all material, because the statute now protects that very class of cases as it is now worded. I did not vote upon it one way or the other, because it was immaterial, in my opinion. But I am strenuously opposed to the amendment——

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman says this amendment would disrupt; but does not the original statute, the words we are trying to strike out, authorize the testimony between husband and wife? In other words, the rule would be one way when he is guilty, and when he is innocent the rule would be otherwise.

Mr. WATKINS. I regret I can not agree with the other Members here as to the interpretation of the language. I think it is sufficiently safeguarded by the expression used. The words in line 17, "as the case may be," seem to have been lost sight of in this discussion. Those words are meaningless unless they mean that when the husband is offered as a witness he can not be compelled to testify for or against the wife, and the wife can not be compelled to testify for or against her husband unless she is willing. That is my interpretation of that language. The word "compelled," construed together with the other words there, "as the case may be," read after the words "husband and wife," I think clearly show that is the intention.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, just a word. The humanity of the law, the wisdom of the law, and the wisdom of ages sanction the doctrine that, except in certain cases where the offense committed by the husband or the wife is an offense against the wife, the one or the other should not be permitted to testify for or against the other. Since the creation of man and woman in the Garden of Eden they have been regarded as only one, living in the holy state of matrimony; but the humanity of the law, the wisdom of the law, and the experience in the long administration of the law show that it was civilization and the advancement of civilization, and the enforcement of the law, that when an offense such as bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, or assaults upon the wife or the husband by one or the other, it was proper that they should testify one for the other, and therefore I have voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, which did not leave that matter to be determined either by the consent of the husband or wife, but they were compelled to testify. We all know how this got to be in this statute here. This statute, as I understand it, makes an exception in the case of polygamy, bigamy, or unlawful cohabitation, and in 1882 and 1887 it was the result of an agitation against the offense against morals in Utah and those States where polygamy was practiced under the Mormons, known as the Edmunds Act. That was the first time we had, as I recollect, in the statutes of the United States a provision for those cases.

Why, you take a wife or a husband charged with murder or with an assault upon some one else, or any other crimes known to the criminal law—whether she wants to or not, whether she consents or not, she is compelled to go upon the witness stand at the direction of the prosecuting officer and testify against her husband. We had that sort of thing in the Dark Ages in the administration of the law, and the rack and the torture were administered to the witnesses in order to make them testify, to men in order to make them confess; and women and daughters have been known to be tortured and to go to their death rather than testify against their husbands. Or else you open wide the door of perjury, because when you place either a good wife or a good husband upon the witness stand to testify in a criminal case against the husband or the wife, and you submit a question that will involve guilt, the wife, loving the husband better than anything else, who has served him all her life, devoted to him, is ready to risk her life to protect him, ready to go down into prison, even into the grave, to save him, even if he might be guilty, will not hesitate to commit the crime of perjury to save her husband; and instead of advancing the enforcement of the law, instead of giving the truth, you hold out inducements to the husband and wife either to refuse to testify and accept punishment at the hands of the court, or color that testimony, or really, in fact, not to state the truth and commit perjury.

It is well, Mr. Chairman, that we stay close to the beaten path in this sort of matters that have been marked out for us by wise men, under which the administration of the law in this sort of cases has been fairly satisfactory.

Therefore I shall not vote for the amendment of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], which proposes in all cases to open wide the door in every sort of case for the admission of the testimony of the husband and wife.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the argument of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]——

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit an interruption there, in order that I may call his attention to a fact that evidently has escaped him? Will you permit me to ask a question?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. WATKINS. This section 106 has already been amended so as to allow the State laws to apply in all these cases.

Mr. CULLOP. As I said, I am always glad to listen, and I do so with pleasure, to the arguments the gentleman from Georgia makes upon any question.

But now he has only presented one side of the proposition involved here. There is another side to it. The wife can be called as a witness in behalf of her husband under the statute as it is now, and the doorway is as wide open for the commission of perjury now as it would be if the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] were adopted.

Mr. BARTLETT. Only in this class of cases, permit me to say.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, let me put this proposition: Suppose a wife has an infant in her arms that she loves dearer than her husband, and the husband kills the infant, and yet the mother can not go into the courthouse and, under a barbarous statute like this, testify against the inhumanity of her own husband and vindicate the outrage.

Suppose the mother has a son, a child by another marriage; the brutal husband may strike him down in cold blood, with no other witness but the wife and mother, and yet under the brutality of such a statute as this justice can not be done and the mother can not testify against the brutal conduct of her inhuman husband, and justice can not be administered. That is the kind of a doctrine that the gentleman from Georgia has just advocated that we here, in the twentieth century, should uphold in the most intelligent nation of all the world. Tell me that a law of that kind is reasonable, that it is fair to society and the best interests of a glorious Nation; that a nation that will tolerate it upon its statute books is moving forward to the high destiny in its administration of justice which the intelligence of its people require and the safety of its social fabric demands? Does not the evolution of the ages appeal to us to write on the pages of the statute books the progress in this respect, the solution of all experience in such matters? Tell me that a statute that would not let that wife testify against the brutal murderer of her infant that was helpless in her arms, which was perpetrated by her husband, should be kept upon the statute books in order to maintain an ancient custom, yea, a custom that would blacken the pages of the court of a Jeffreys when it was in its most ignominious career, in the ostensible administration of justice; a statute which will not let the wife testify without the consent of the husband charged with the heinous crime of striking down her offspring—the mother, because she is the wife—but that she must sit in silence, nurse her sorrow with her lips sealed, because the husband will not consent to her telling the truth? If we do, we commit a wrong against society and the administration of justice. Yea, gentlemen, we ought to break away from such an unpardonable custom as that. We ought to strike down the shackles from the truth, bare the secrets, turn on the searchlight, and reveal the facts as they exist, and assist society and the advancement of civilization and demonstrate there is progress in the administration of the law in our courts in this enlightened period, as well as in other departments of the world; that the ancient customs and practices of an antiquated system are abolished and a new and better era has dawned to glorify the age in which we live.

But instead of that they say "Keep this antiquated statute of the Dark Ages upon the statute books for fear that we may make some new departure, and that we will make some progress in the courts of our country where progress is needed and where justice demands that it be made." We plead for a better procedure in the interests of society and the good order of our people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of the administration of justice, in the interest of progress in the law, in the interest of society, in the interest of a people who are striving to administer justice for the better protection of their lives, persons, and property, for enhancement of the common good, let us adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, and the lovers of law and the lovers of order and the lovers of justice will commend the act with more vigor and more enthusiasm than anything else you are writing in this statute here to-day. [Applause.] I know how slow some are in all legislation to depart from customs and habits of the past, but let me remind them that we are not now doing things as our fathers did them, but we are keeping step with the evolution of the times in every other department of life, but here in this, one of the most important, sacred institutions of all, we are behind in the great march of passing events, and following in the footsteps of the ancients, much to the detriment of our reputation for good order and the advancement of society. Woman occupies a different sphere in government to-day from that she occupied when this antiquated provision was first written into the law, and the new conditions require a different treatment of her status in our courts on this important proposition, and to remedy this inequality and rectify this wrong we most earnestly plead for this wholesome correction of the law defining her status for the protection of society and the improvement of social conditions, and the better administration of justice in our courts, which are ever the guardians of our social conditions and the protection of the lives, persons, and property of our citizens. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized for five minutes, and I move to strike out the last word.

I want to call attention of gentlemen on the other side to this proposition. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. I think it is indicative of the larger humanity and takes the larger view. I should like to have his attention, if he will give it to me. I favor the amendment because I think that is what we ought to come to; but it occurs to me, gentlemen, that if these words are stricken out, so that it shall apply to all crimes, that we should take back the action which the committee has taken by striking out the words "but shall not be compelled." I think it could hardly be asked now that we could compel the wife to testify against the husband in cases of all crime. If we give her that privilege, is not that taking a great step in advance, and is not that as far as we ought to go? The difficulty is now that we have stricken out these words "but shall not be compelled," and therefore the law as it would stand if we strike out these additional words would be to the effect that a woman will be compelled to testify against her husband or the husband compelled to testify against his wife in any case for any crime. I think that is perhaps going further than we ought to go. If our action can be taken with regard to striking out the words "but shall not be compelled," I shall be very glad, indeed, to support the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINGO. If the interpretation of some were correct, then your suggestion would be wise; but in view of the interpretation of the chairman of the committee of that statute, would we not then be in the same dilemma we were in when we started trying to amend it?

Mr. TOWNER. I think that is an indication, if the gentleman will pardon me, that the gentleman's interpretation is not right, and I do not believe it is shared by other gentlemen on the floor. I have not heard anybody else but the chairman of the committee take that view as to the interpretation of the statute. Let us do the right thing, and let us send this bill to the Senate as it ought to be. Do not let them have the credit of making these corrections. Do not let it be said it is necessary for the Senate to fix up a bill to correct the mistakes made by the House. Let us put back the words "or shall not be compelled," and strike out these words, "bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation," and then we shall have placed ourselves upon defensible and advanced grounds, to which I think the other Chamber will follow.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 12.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment there. I move to amend by striking out, beginning with the word "and," in line 15, down to the word "be" in line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, line 15, strike out after the word "witness" the following language: "and may be called in such proceeding, examination, or prosecution without the consent of the husband or wife, as the case may be."

Mr. BRYAN. That is the same proposition. I will not take up any time in debating it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 10.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. I think, Mr. Chairman, we ought to have a quorum on a matter of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of no quorum?

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman will not press that point. We have made no headway to-day. We ought to make headway on this very important business.

Mr. WINGO. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that. We are anxious to expedite business.

Mr. BRYAN. Can I have consent, Mr. Chairman, to leave this open for amendment, as was suggested a while ago, until next Wednesday?

Mr. WATKINS. I can not agree to that, Mr. Chairman. We have taken up enough time on the section to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman ought not to press his point. We ought to make some headway on this bill. Although it is a very hot day, we ought to go on for an hour or two.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point, but I will bring it up again in another place. There are only 12 Members on a side.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to line 16 for the purpose of restoring to the amendment the words "to testify," so that it will read "and may be called to testify in such proceeding." I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] struck out inadvertently the words "to testify" when he intended to strike out only the words following.

The CHAIRMAN. That is section 108?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; line 16, section 108; to restore the words "to testify."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The amendment already adopted strikes out the words "but shall not be compelled to testify," in lines 15 and 16.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That should be restored.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] is here, and his opinion on the subject may be had.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to restore the words "to testify," two words that were stricken out. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] consents to it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I understand the proposition offered by the gentleman is to restore the words "to testify," stricken out a moment ago on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the section be read as amended in that way.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee having adopted an amendment, will it not be necessary before it can be changed to ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote whereby that amendment was adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of that opinion.

Mr. WATKINS. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if we have an amendment inserted, "to testify," after the word "compelled," it would have to be a separate and distinct amendment, and would not have reference to any amendment already passed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It would merely perfect the language.

Mr. STAFFORD. You are trying to incorporate some words that have heretofore been stricken out. The question is, Can the House go ahead with the proceeding of striking out a portion of a paragraph and then allowing some person to add some language that had been stricken out? In that way we shall never get anywhere. I ask unanimous consent that the vote heretofore taken on the amendment be vacated.

Mr. WINGO. The proposition now is to amend this section as it now stands by inserting the words "to testify" after the word "called."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] offered to strike out the words, beginning on line 15 and ending on line 16, "but shall not be compelled to testify."

Mr. WINGO. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. That was stricken out, as the Chair understands. Now the proposition is to restore the words "to testify," that were stricken out.

Mr. WINGO. That is the practical effect; but the formal motion is an amendment to the section as it now stands by inserting the words "to testify" after the word "called." That would meet the technical objection raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a question of procedure, Mr. Chairman. Supposing, then, some person would come around and make a motion to insert the word "compelled," if the Chair holds it in order to amend by adding the words "to testify." Then some person else comes along and inserts the word "be," until each word of that which was stricken out is reinserted. In that case the House would never get anywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. It is permissible to strike out the words in one place and insert them in another place. In this case the words were stricken out, but they are proposed to be put back in another place.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; they remain in the same place, Mr. Chairman. Let me direct the Chair's attention to this fact, that if the original motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] had been to strike out merely the words "but shall not be compelled," leaving the words "to testify," then the purpose of this amendment would be accomplished. I wish to emphasize again the fact that if the Chair holds that it is now in order to do this the committee will never get anywhere. The first thing to do is to ask unanimous consent to return or to have it put in. It can not be offered as an amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask that the words "to testify" be inserted, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent to restore the words "to testify." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 111. In the trial of actions at law the courts of the United States may, on motion and due notice thereof, require the parties to produce books or writings in their possession or power which contain evidence pertinent to the issue in cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery. If a plaintiff fails to comply with such order, the court may on motion give the like judgment for the defendant as in cases of nonsuit, and if a defendant fails to comply with such order the court may on motion give judgment against him by default.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 67, line 7, after the word "in," insert the words "preparation for and at."

Mr. TOWNER. The effect of that amendment will be to make the section read:

In preparation for and at the trial of actions at law the courts of the United States may—

And so forth. I will say to the chairman of the committee that the reason for that is that this class of testimony, consisting of exhibits, books, and so forth, is as necessary before the grand jury and in a preliminary investigation as upon the trial of the case. This was called to my attention by a United States judge for the purpose of meeting that difficulty.

Mr. WATKINS. If there is to be no further discussion on this amendment, I will make no objection to it. If, however, the progress of the bill is to be retarded by discussing the amendment at length, I will have some observations to make on it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 67, line 9, after the word "produce," insert the word "things."

Mr. TOWNER. The object of that amendment is merely to allow the introduction not only of books and writings but of things; for instance, in a prosecution for larceny or any other case where the thing itself or a weapon or something of that kind is necessary to be introduced, so that such "thing" may also be introduced in evidence.

Mr. WATKINS. If a comma is inserted after the word "things," I shall have no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. That may be done, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 67, line 10, strike out the word "contain" and insert in lieu thereof the word "furnish."

Mr. TOWNER. The reason for that amendment is that the word "contain" refers only to books and writings. Of course, there are very many other objects of evidence of this character that may be introduced, and the word "furnish" is used so that it may be applicable to all kinds of testimony of this character.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 67, line 13, after the word "chancery," insert the words "or when approved by the court having jurisdiction over the action."

Mr. TOWNER. The object of that amendment will be apparent when I read the words as they will be with the amendment inserted:

In cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to furnish the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery or when approved by the court having jurisdiction over the action.

In some cases the order of the court can not be effective unless that language is added. It is technical, of course.

Mr. BARTLETT. I move to strike out the last word. I do not quite get the purport of the gentleman's amendment. This refers to the production of books and papers?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is the old law. Does the gentleman think it is wise to say that if a man fails to produce a book or paper, the opposite party shall have judgment, or nonsuit? Of course that is the present law.

Mr. TOWNER. This section has nothing to do with that.

Mr. BARTLETT. But that is the next paragraph.

Mr. TOWNER. This is only to give the court the power to compel the production of this kind of evidence in any case or proceeding where the court thinks it may be necessary for him so to do.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; but the next section provides that if the plaintiff fails to comply with the order, the court may give judgment for the defendant, or nonsuit, and if the defendant fails to comply the court may give judgment against him by default for failure to produce the books or papers. That is the law, as I understand.

Mr. TOWNER. That is the law now. The amendment does not change the rule.

Mr. BARTLETT. Your amendment does not change the rule, except to add another instance in which, if he fails to comply with the order, there may be judgment in favor of the other party.

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman will see, it does not even do that. It only allows the court to order the production of these things in a case that the court may have jurisdiction of, when he thinks it is necessary.

Mr. BARTLETT. Ordinarily the failure to produce a book or document gives the opposing party the right to produce secondary evidence of it. That is the rule. If the party having evidence within his control fails to produce it, that is a fact that may be considered injuriously to his case, and permits the party who calls for the evidence to adduce secondary evidence of it. This is a broader power, which permits the court, for the failure to produce testimony within the control of the party, to grant a nonsuit or judgment.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; that will be the effect of a later paragraph.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman will note the section provides that these books and papers shall be furnished in cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery, and the amendment adds——

Mr. TOWNER. Or when approved by the court having jurisdiction.

Mr. BRYAN. Is not that a mere matter of procedure? It provides that the books are to be brought in under the rules that are provided in courts of chancery, and when you extend it, does it not really make a limitation? If they are brought in under the chancery rules and you add something else, do not you complicate instead of simplify the procedure?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I think not. I can see no reason why it should have that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TOWNER) there were—ayes 4, noes 6.

So the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 113. The testimony of any witness may be taken in any civil cause depending in a district court by deposition de bene esse, when the witness lives at a greater distance from the place of trial than 100 miles, or is bound on a voyage to sea, or is about to go out of the United States, or out of the district in which the case is to be tried, and to a greater distance than 100 miles from the place of trial, before the time of trial, or when he is ancient and infirm. The deposition may be taken before any judge of any court of the United States, or any United States commissioner, or any clerk of a district court, or any chancellor, justice, or judge of a supreme or a superior court, mayor or chief magistrate of a city, judge of a county court or court of common pleas of any of the United States, or any notary public of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, not being of counsel or attorney to either of the parties, nor interested in the event of the cause. Reasonable notice must first be given in writing by the party or his attorney proposing to take such deposition to the opposite party or his attorney of record, as either may be nearest, which notice shall state the name of the witness and the time and place of the taking of his deposition; and in all cases in rem the person having the agency or possession of the property at the time of seizure shall be deemed the adverse party until a claim shall have been put in; and whenever, by reason of the absence from the district and want of an attorney of record or other reason, the giving of the notice herein required shall be impracticable, it shall be lawful to take such depositions as there shall be urgent necessity for taking, upon such notice as any judge authorized to hold courts in such district shall think reasonable and direct. Any person may be compelled to appear and depose as provided by this section in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify in court.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 68, line 2, after the word "or," strike out the words "out of the district in which the case is to be tried and."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, that is for the purpose of making it harmonize with other sections similar in character.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 122. When a commission to take the testimony of any witness, found within the District of Columbia, to be used in a suit depending in any State or Territorial or foreign court, is issued from such court, or a notice to the same effect is given according to its rules of practice, and such commission or notice is produced to a justice of the supreme court of said District, and due proof is made to him that the testimony of such witness is material to the party desiring the same, the said justice shall issue a summons to the witness, requiring him to appear before the commissioners named in the commission or notice, to testify in such suit, at a time and at a place within said District therein specified.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 73, line 15, after the word "the," strike out the word "commissioners" and insert the word "officer."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, that is to make it harmonize with other provisions and sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 126. When any commission or letter rogatory, issued to take the testimony of any witness in a foreign country, in any suit in which the United States are parties or have an interest, is executed by the court or the commissioner to whom it is directed, it shall be returned by such court or commissioner to the minister or consul of the United States nearest the place where it is executed. On receiving the same, the said minister or consul shall indorse thereon a certificate, stating when and where the same was received, and that the said deposition is in the same condition as when he received it; and he shall thereupon transmit the said letter or commission, so executed and certified, by mail, to the clerk of the court from which the same issued, in the manner in which his official dispatches are transmitted to the Government. The testimony of witnesses so taken and returned shall be read as evidence on the trial of the suit in which it was taken, without objection as to the method of returning the same. When letters rogatory are addressed from any court of a foreign country to any district court of the United States, a United States commissioner designated by said court to make the examination of the witnesses mentioned in said letters shall have power to compel the witnesses to appear and depose in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify in courts.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think that inasmuch as the weather is excessively warm and we have been here strenuously at work all day, and the further fact that a great many Members have engagements to attend to, a lot of mail to dispose of before they go home to dinner, we ought to rise, and I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman withdraw that until this section can be perfected?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have three amendments to be offered to perfect the section. It is not my disposition to quit work at this time of the day. If the gentleman from Illinois had been here as closely as I have—for I have not had time to eat a lunch or go to get a drink of water—I might have acquiesced; but in view of the fact that this is the first time I have seen the gentleman here this afternoon, I do not feel that I can yield to his importunity.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Thirty-one Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, there is a point made of no quorum, and the gentleman can not make the motion without that matter being determined.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the Chair can entertain a motion that the committee rise at any time before the roll has begun to be called.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. FOSTER, and, on a division, there were 17 ayes and 8 noes.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Seven gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no other side. The rule requires 20 Members, one-fifth of a quorum, and the committee determines to rise.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, for 14 days on account of important business.

To Mr. TEN EYCK, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 264. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the Sixth International Congress of Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Industrial Associations.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 3112. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain right of way near Engle, N. Mex.; to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

THE MEXICAN SITUATION.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Mexican situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were 18 ayes and 8 noes.

So the motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 54 minutes) the House, under the special rule, adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 28, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Wabash River, Ind. and Ill., from its mouth to Terre Haute, with a special report as to improving said river up to Mount Carmel by dredging (H. Doc. No. 1001); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting items of estimates for public buildings work and requesting that same be incorporated in the sundry civil appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915 (H. Doc. No. 1000); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. BOWDLE, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16055) to amend section 4474 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 718), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. CHURCH, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1580) for the relief of John R. Norris, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 717), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. METZ, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11772) for the relief of the P. J. Carlin Construction Co., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 719), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16713) for the relief of Samson Davis, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 720), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BLACKMON: A bill (H. R. 16874) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Alabama; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.
